(b) that, so far as is reasonably practicable, the composition of the Board is such as to provide a proper balance between the interests of, on the one hand, qualified conveyancers and executry practitioners and, on the other hand, those who make use of their services.'

The amendment fulfils an undertaking that I gave in Committee to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar).

Mr. Dewar: I shall be brief, but the amendment is worth comment. I thank the Minister for honouring his undertaking on a quite significant matter. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Scottish Consumer Council pressed hard for the amendment, and it was right to take an interest in the executry board's membership. The amendment brings us into line with the phraseology that appears in the Courts and Legal Services Bill, which is the English equivalent. The important point is that, in appointing members to the board, the Government are committed to ensuring that

"as far as is reasonably practical, the composition of the Board is such as to provide a proper balance between the interests of, on the one hand, qualified conveyancers and executry practitioners and, on the other hand, those who make use of their services."

It is important to maintain that balance. There is a danger, which we could fall into unintentionally, of appointing to the board only people with technical skills, so that the board ends up with a collection of lawyers, qualified conveyancers and suchlike. Of course they have an important contribution to make, but it is valuable to put in statute a burden on the Government to keep in mind the need for proper representation of those who consume the services—not in a token manner, but as a means of ensuring a proper balance. I understand that to be more than someone being a lone individual playing a lone role against the serried ranks of those who may—not in a vicious, but in a practical sense—have a vested interest in the profession that is being regulated. It is a worthwhile provision, and I thank the Minister for including it.

Amendment agreed to.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 61, in page 66, line 6, at end insert—

'(2) Where a person ceases to be a member of the Board otherwise than on the expiry of his term of office, and it appears to the Board that there are special circumstances which make it right for that person to receive compensation, the Board may, with the consent of the Secretary of State, make a payment to that person of such amount as the Board may, with the consent of the Secretary of State, determine,'

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this we may discuss Government amendments Nos. 62, 68 and 109.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: These are technical amendments relating to the payment of pension provisions for the ombudsman.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 62, in page 66, line 13, leave out

'by way of compensation for loss of employment' and insert '(including pensions, allowances or gratuities by way of compensation to or in respect of any such employee who suffers loss of employment).'

No. 63, in page 68, leave out lines 14 to 17 and insert—

'18. The Board may exercise the power conferred by paragraph 18A below for the following purposes—

(a) an inquiry under subsection (1) of section 18 of this Act;

(b) a review of a decision by virtue of subsection (10)(a) of that section; and

(c) consideration by the Board whether to exercise the powers conferred on them by section (Board's intervention powers) of this Act.

18A. The Board may give notice in writing to a practitioner specifying the subject matter of their investigation and requiring either or both of the following-'.

PUBLICATION OF APPLICATIONS MADE UNDER SECTION 22

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 67, in page 69, line 4, after 'a' insert 'daily'.

This is a simple amendment that responds to a point raised by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell). Originally it was tabled as amendment (a), but another, controversial amendment was also marked (a), and the two were confused. I promised to put the matter right on Report.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Perhaps I might be allowed a small moment of self-congratulation. This amendment is the only material alteration that I have made during the passage of the Bill. It may be a case of "Si monumentum requiris, circumspice."

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 3

SCOTTISH LEGAL SERVICES OMBUDSMAN

Amendments made: No. 68, in page 69, line 25, at end insert—

'(2) Where a person appointed to the office of ombudsman ceases to hold that office otherwise than on the expiry of the term of office specified in his appointment, and it appears to the Secretary of State that there are special circumstances which make it right for that person to receive compensation, the Secretary of State may, with the consent of the Treasury, make a payment to that person of such amount as the Secretary of State may, with the consent of the Treasury, determine.'

No. 109, in page 69, line 29, leave out from 'remuneration' to end of line 30 and insert

'and as to compensation for loss of employment (which may take the form of pensions, allowances or gratuities).

4A. Neither the ombudsman nor his staff are, in such capacity, Crown servants.'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Schedule 4

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Dewar: I beg to move amendment No. 140, in page 70, line 17, leave out

'had a right of audience in both the Court of Session and the High Court of Judiciary' and insert

'been admitted as a solicitor in Scotland'.

I cannot find the amendment—[Interruption.] It is obviously an interesting amendment of great importance. [Interruption.] I cannot find it and the House will have to bear with me for a moment. I have found it, and I am confirmed in my opinion that it is an interesting amendment about which the House will no doubt feel strongly. Unfortunately, it is not one that I can debate at any great length in the present circumstances. I shall briefly state my grievance, take it away and nurse it until another occasion.

I accuse the Minister—but not in any unparliamentary sense—of, if not fraud, at least a little sleight of hand. We are dealing with the right of a solicitor to be considered for a place on the bench of the Court of Session. When that was first mooted, I had the impression that any solicitor could be considered, provided that he had met the time qualification of one year in practice. It now appears that, in fact, he must have had right of audience in both the Court of Session and the High Court of Justiciary for the requisite number of years. In other words, he must be one of those strange hybrid animals—a solicitor—advocate. That is unduly restrictive.

Although it will not be common, it is possible that someone such as a senior partner in a big commercial practice, whose views on commercial law, company law and a whole range of issues are widely respected, and who would have the standing that might tempt his brother professionals to ask for his professional opinion, might aspire to that position. I hasten to add that I would never aspire to be, nor ever would be, in such a category. I am not sure that it would be right to say that, if such a person wished to aspire to what is, in many ways, the highest honour in his trade—a place on the bench of the Court of Session—he should have to go through such an odd, and at the moment untried, formula of gaining right of audience in the Court of Session and the High Court of Justiciary.

[Mr. Dewar]

It may be unlikely that someone will be considered for the High Court bench who has not had direct Court of Session experience. However, the spirit behind the widening of the selection was that solicitors should at least be possible candidates and, in exceptional circumstances, might even be chosen. I understand that it is now possible for a solicitor to go to the shrieval bench and therefore come up that way rather than having had active life in the Court of Session.

I shall not press the amendment, but its intention was to make it clear that a solicitor was a solicitor under the new proposals, considered on his merits, who did not have to go through the hoop or over the hurdle of becoming a solicitor-advocate in the way described in the Bill. I do not expect the Minister to accept the amendment, but as we have a few minutes in hand I hope that he will explain why the Bill will rule out a large number of solicitors from consideration—many of whom, I suspect, are the most respected members of the profession, whom many of us might think to be the most appropriate for consideration.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Eligibility of criteria for appointment as a Court of Session judge was discussed in the Secretary of State's consultation paper issued in March 1989. As a result, it was suggested that the application of that principle to situations where solicitors had rights of audience in supreme courts would require the introduction of changes in statute. It was suggested that, if they had rights of audience for five years, they should be eligible. That was widely welcomed by those consulted, including the representative bodies concerned.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has proposed a major amendment, and in considering it we do not have the benefit of the views of all the different groups and organisations that have an interest in judicial appointments. The response to the consultations last year on behalf of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State did not suggest that his proposals relating to the eligibility of criteria for judicial appointments were over-restrictive. In fact, the Bill ensures that in future all lawyers, whether advocates or solicitors, who have served as sheriffs principal or sheriffs for five years or more, should be eligible for appointment as a senator of the Court of Justice.

The amendment not only has technical deficiencies, but more importantly it would serve to weaken the eligibility criteria for the most senior judicial appointments in Scotland. Therefore, reluctantly, I must say that I cannot accept it.

Mr. Dewar: The Minister is always a man of charity and I am grateful for the word "reluctantly" in his last sentence. I shall have to be content with that.

I hope that, as the new arrangements unfold—I concede that that will be over a number of years—the restrictions about which I have complained will be reassessed and, perhaps, a more generous and unreluctant view taken of my case.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 116, in page 95, line 28, at beginning insert—

'In subsection (3) of section 4 (Scottish Legal Aid Fund) of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986—

(a) paragraph (a) shall cease to have effect; and

(b) in paragraph (c), after the word "property" there shall be inserted "(including money)".

(1A) .'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 117, 118, 119, 121, 122 and 123.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The first amendments are technical, but amendment No. 119 is a bit more substantial. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will be able, by regulation, to insist that an assisted person be represented in the supreme courts by a solicitor with rights of audience there rather than by an advocate. That choice will be for the client alone and that will be followed.

Amendment agreed to.

"(2A) Except in so far as regulations made under this section otherwise provide, any sum of money recovered under an award of or an agreement as to expenses in favour of any party in any proceedings in respect of which he is or has been in receipt of civil legal aid shall be paid to the Board.

(2B) Except in so far as regulations made under this section otherwise provide, where, in any proceedings, there is a net liability of the Fund on the account of any party, the amount of that liability shall be paid to the Board by that party, in priority to any other debts, out of any property (wherever situate) which is recovered or preserved for him—

(a) in the proceedings; or

(b) under any settlement to avoid them or to bring them to an end.".

(4B) Subsections (3) to (5) of that section shall cease to have effect.

(4C) In subsection (6) of that section, for the words "subsection (5)" there shall be substituted the words "subsections (2A) or (2B)".

(4D) In subsection (8) of that section, for the words from "subsection" to the end there shall be substituted the words "subsection (1) above and in section 33 of this Act to "fees and outlays" include references to sums which would have been payable to that solicitor if he had been so employed.".'

No. 119, in page 96, line 20, leave out from 'words' where it first appears to the end of line 21 and insert—

'", his counsel" there shall be substituted the words "or a solicitor holding rights of audience by virtue of section 25A (rights of audience) of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980, his counsel or such a solicitor".

(8A) In subsection (9)(b) of the said section 31, at the beginning there shall be inserted "Subject to subsection (11) below,".

(8B) At the end of the said section 31 there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(11) Nothing in subsection (9)(b) above shall enable the Secretary of State to make regulations authorising the granting of legal aid only to solicitors holding rights of audience under section 25A (rights of audience) of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980.".'.

No. 120, in page 96, line 26, at end insert—

'The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1987 (c. 41)

33A. In section 6(1) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1987 (definition of implicative gifts), for the words "mentioned in section 5(2) of this Act" there shall be substituted "on which, in respect of a person suspected of, or charged with, an offence to which section 1 of this Act relates, the warrant to arrest and commit was granted, or a restraint order was made (whichever first occurs).".'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

SUPERVISED ATTENDANCE ORDERS: FURTHER PROVISIONS

1.—(1) A court shall not make a supervised attendance order in respect of any offender unless—

(a) the court has been notified by the Secretary of State that arrangements exist for persons who reside in the locality in which the offender resides, or will be residing when the order comes into force, to carry out the requirements of such an order;

(b) the court is satisfied that provision can be made under the arrangements mentioned in paragraph (a) above for the offender to carry out such requirements.

(2) Before making a supervised attendance order, the court shall explain to the offender in ordinary language—

(a) the purpose and effect of the order and in particular the obligations on the offender as specified in paragraph 3 below;

(b) the consequences which may follow under paragraph 4 below if he fails to comply with any of those requirements; and

(c) that the court has, under paragraph 5 below, the power to review the order on the application either of the offender or of an officer of the local authority in whose area the offender for the time being resides.

(3) The Secretary of State may by order direct that subsection (2) of section (Supervised attendance orders as alternative to imprisonment on fine default) of this Act shall be amended by substituting, for any number of hours specified in that subsection such other number of hours as may be specified in the order; and an order under this subsection may in making such amendment specify a different such numbers of hours for different classes of case.

(4) An order under paragraph (3) above shall be made by statutory instrument, but no such order shall be made unless a draft of it has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.

2.—(1) A supervised attendance order shall—

(a) specify the locality in which the offender resides or will be residing when the order comes into force; and

(b) require the local authority in whose area the locality specified under paragraph (a) above is situated to appoint or assign a supervising officer.

(2) Where, whether on the same occasion or on separate occasions, an offender is made subject to more than one supervised attendance order, the court may direct that the requirements specified in any of those orders shall be concurrent with or additional to those specified in any other of those orders, but so that at no time shall the offender have an outstanding number of hours during which he must carry out the requirements of these orders in excess of the largest number specified in section (Supervised attendance orders as alternative to imprisonment on fine default) of this Act.

(3) Upon making a supervised attendance order the court shall—

(a) give a copy of the order to the offender;

(b) send a copy of the order to the director of social work of the local authority in whose area the offender resides or will be residing when the order comes into force; and

(c) where it is not the appropriate court, send a copy of the order (together with such documents and information relating to the case as are considered useful) to the clerk of the appropriate court.

3.—(1) An offender in respect of whom a supervised attendance order is in force shall report to the supervising officer and notify him without delay of any change of address or in the times, if any, at which he usually works.

(2) Subject to paragraph 5(1) below, instructions given under a supervised attendance order shall be carried out during the period of twelve months beginning with the date of the order; but, unless revoked, the order shall remain in force until the offender has carried out the instructions given under it for the number of hours specified in it.

(3) The instructions given by the supervising officer under the order shall, so far as practicable, be such as to avoid any conflict with the offender's religious beliefs and any interference with the times, if any, at which he normally works or attends a school or other educational establishment.

4.—(1) If at any time while a supervised attendance order is in force in respect of any offender it appears to the appropriate court, on evidence on oath from the supervising officer, that that offender has failed to comply with any of the requirements of paragraph 3 above or of the order (including any failure satisfactorily to carry out any instructions which he has been given by the supervising officer under the order), the court may issue a warrant for the arrest of that offender, or may, if it thinks fit, instead of issuing a warrant in the first instance issue a citation requiring the offender to appear before that court at such time as may be specified in the citation.

(2) If it is proved to the satisfaction of the court before which an offender is brought or appears in pursuance of sub-paragraph (1) above that he has failed without reasonable excuse to comply with any of the requirements of paragraph 3 above or of the order (including any failure satisfactorily to carry out any instructions which he has been given by the supervising officer under the order), the court may—

(a) revoke the order and impose such period of imprisonment as could, in respect of the original default or failure, have been imposed by the court which made the order if the order had not been made; or

(b) subject to section (Supervised attendance orders as alternative to imprisonment on default) of this Act and paragraph 2(2) above, vary the number of hours specified in the order.

(3) The evidence of one witness shall, for the purposes of sub-paragraph (2) above, be sufficient evidence.

5.—(1) Where a supervised attendance order is in force in respect of any offender and, on the application of that offender or of the supervising officer, it appears to the appropriate court that it would be in the interests of justice to do so having regard to circumstances which have arisen since the order was made, that court may—

(a) extend, in relation to the order, the period of twelve months specified in paragraph 3 above;

(b) subject to section (Supervised attendance orders as alternative to imprisonment on default) of this Act and paragraph 2(2) above, vary the number of hours specified in the order;

(c) revoke the order; or

(d) revoke the order and impose such period of imprisonment as could, in respect of the original default or failure, have been imposed by the court which made the order if the order had not been made.

(2) If the appropriate court is satisfied that the offender proposes to change, or has changed, his residence from the locality for the time being specified under paragraph 2(1)(a) above to another locality and—

(a) that court has been notified by the Secretary of State that arrangements exist for persons who reside in that other locality to carry out instructions under supervised attendance orders; and

(b) it appears to that court that provision can be made under those arrangements for him to carry out instructions under the order; that court may, and on application of the supervising officer shall, amend the order by substituting that other locality for the locality for the time being specified in the order; and the provisions of section (Supervised attendance orders as alternative to imprisonment on fine default) of this Act and of this Schedule shall apply to the order as amended.

(3) Where the court proposes to exercise its powers under sub-paragraph (1)(a), (b) or (d) above otherwise than on the application of the offender, it shall issue a citation requiring him to appear before the court and, if he fails to appear, may issue a warrant for his arrest.

6.—(1) The Secretary of State may make rules for regulating the carrying out of the requirements of supervised attendance orders.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) above, rules under this section may—

(a) limit the number of hours during which the requirements of an order are to be met on any one day;

(b) make provision as to the reckoning of time for the purposes of the carrying out of these requirements;

(c) make provision for the payment of travelling and other expenses in connection with the carrying out of these requirements;

(d) provide for records to be kept of what has been done by any person carrying out these requirements.

(3) Rules under this paragraph shall be made by statutory instrument subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.

7. The Secretary of State shall lay before Parliament each year, or incorporate in annual reports he already makes, a report of the operation of section (Supervised attendance orders as alternative to imprisonment on fine default) of this Act and this Schedule.

8. In section 27 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 (supervision of persons put on probation, released from prison or subject to community service orders)—

(a) in subsection (1)(b) there shall be inserted at the end the following "; and

(iv) without prejudice to paragraphs (i) to (iii) above, persons in their area who are subject to supervised attendance orders under section (Supervised attendance orders as alternative to imprisonment on fine default) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1990.";

(b) for the words "probation and community service scheme", wherever they occur, there shall be substituted the words "probation, community service and supervised attendance scheme".

9.—(1) In this Schedule—

"the appropriate court", in relation to a supervised attendance order, means the court having jurisdiction in the locality for the time being specified in the order under paragraph 2(1)(a) above, being a sheriff or district court according to whether the order has been made by a sheriff or a district court, but in a case where the order has been made by a district court and there is no district court in that locality, the sheriff court;

"local authority" and "supervising officer" have the same meanings respectively as in section (Supervised attendance orders as alternative to imprisonment on fine default) of this Act.

(2) Except where the context otherwise requires, expressions used in this Schedule and in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 have the same meanings in this Schedule as in that Act.'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Amendments made: No. 127, in line 9, after 'licensing:' insert

'to make special provision in relation to the giving of evidence by children in criminal trials;'.

No. 128, in line 9, after 'licensing:' insert

'to empower a sheriff court to try offences committed in the district of a different sheriff court in the same sheriffdom;'.

No. 96, in line 11, after 'prison' insert

'and for supervised attendance as an alternative to imprisonment on default in paying a fine'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 89, in line 15, leave out

'in relation to homelessness due to risk of violence'.

This amendment will ensure that the long title more accurately reflects the amendments to the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 that are included in the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

6.34 pm

Mr. Dewar: There will be one or two Third Reading speeches, but they will all be marked by their brevity.

I look back with some satisfaction on the Bill, but it will remain something of a curiosity in the annals of Scottish parliamentary procedure. Never were so many columns of Hansard filled in so short a time.

The situation now is rather different, but it is appropriate that for most of this evening the Under-Secretary of State laboured on alone, accompanied only by the Secretary of State. I say entirely appropriate because, in a sense, they were alone for almost the entire Committee stage.

The Under-Secretary of State gets tired of people paying tribute to him, but I must do so on this occasion. He ploughed on with remarkable courage, often sounding like Bertie Wooster, but in a sense as unflappable as Jeeves. Never have I seen briefs put to such determined use when all round him there was chaos and confusion. At times —this is a factual observation—the Committee Room looked like the last act of "The Duchess of Malfi", with bodies everywhere. We saw the decrowning of the chairman of the Scottish Conservative party and we saw blood on every side, but in the middle of it all the Under-Secretary of State kept going, and for that he deserves some credit.

I hope that no one will accuse me of over-complacency, but Opposition Members—I include my friends in other parties, particularly the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and, an honorary blood brother for this occasion only, the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn), who I believe in the many votes taken in Committee voted for the Government only once, not by mistake but as a matter of principle, and we all allow the hon. and learned Gentleman his occasional aberrations of principle—did good work. I cannot remember any Bill that has left our hands more changed and more lightened. A great deal of rubbish had gone and many good things had been added, for which we can claim some credit.

I also want to thank those from outside this place who helped us. It may not be proper to mention them in detail, but a number of bodies have laboured long and hard, perhaps above all the Law Society. Many others, such as the Scottish Consumer Council, were also involved and their help, although not always uncritically received, was invaluable. Their contribution to the law of Scotland may not be major, but the Bill makes a better contribution to it than it otherwise would have done.

A number of issues of real importance have had to go by the board. I have explained this before, but I stress it again. The Opposition were implacably opposed to what was suggested, but it was impossible in the ludicrous time scale suggested to look at the matters adequately—I am thinking particularly of changes in the divorce laws, licensing laws and some good ideas on reforming fines in the criminal courts, along with a number of other matters. I hope that we will have an opportunity to return to those before too long.

I understand that there is a possibility next Session of legislation on parole. The Under-Secretary of State, probably wisely, remained silent when I said that I hoped that would be a Scottish Bill, not a throwaway Scottish insert in a United Kingdom Criminal Justice Bill. The Kincraig report contained some serious propositions and I hope that if we are to implement some of them, as we should, we will do so on the basis of Scottish legislation.

Perhaps that would give us an opportunity to return to some of the issues, or perhaps there should be another Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill—I hope that the Secretary of State does not blanch at the thought—before too long. It has all been good fun, and —on a more serious note—rather a useful exercise.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: The Leader of the House will remember that the late F. E. Smith—late at night and after some appallingly boring and long-drawn-out speeches—was asked to give a vote of thanks. He said "Before I came here I prepared two speeches, one long and one short, and because of the lateness of the hour I intend to give them both." I intend to give neither. All that I want to say is that I hope that our Government and our party will not break the rule that rules should not be multiplied and that legislation of any kind is a bad thing.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: When we set out to consider the Bill, few of us realised that it would prove such an effective springboard for the career of Lord Sanderson of Bowden, or that it would have such a dramatic effect on unemployment statistics in the city of Edinburgh. Had we known that those dramas were being enacted as we went through our routine day-by-day examination of its clauses in Committee, it might have added a certain piquancy to our proceedings, and might even have persuaded the press and television to take yet more interest in our efforts to improve the law of Scotland.

One thing is certainly true: putting charities, reform of the legal profession and licensing law reform into a Bill, and then adding what were genuinely miscellaneous provisions, meant that many important issues failed to receive the time and the detailed intellectual consideration that they undoubtedly deserved.

The Under-Secretary of State deserves our congratulations on his indefatigability and his continuing courtesy to all sides. Sometimes it seemed that a greater strain was being put on his courtesy by those behind him than by those who were nominally opposing him. However, he survived.

I look forward with considerable pleasure to accounts of our proceedings as they will appear in biographies which I know are yet to be written. The role that some people played in the proceedings, especially in Committee, will be marked in passages of such colour and verve that they will come to be regarded as significant contributions to English fiction.

No doubt the Bill will pass into law. It contains many good things, but I fear that it also contains a number of bad laws, the lack of quality of which will be properly explored and made clear only when some of the measures that we have passed into law are put into practice. Undoubtedly, it has been a learning experience for all of us. I do not think that anyone will wish to oppose Third Reading at this stage, but it can certainly be said that the Bill is now in rather better condition that it deserved.

Mr. Dalyell: As one who has been present for the past two days' debate on the Floor of the House but was not a member of the Committee, I should like to say thank you to my parliamentary colleagues of all parties who have taken part in our discussions, as well as to the officials and to the Law Society of Scotland for having improved, in many respects, the lot of our Scottish constituents.

Dr. Godman: This is the second Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill in which I have been involved; I hope that a considerable time will elapse before I am called back by the Whips to take part in a third. I only hope that, if I am placed on the Standing Committee on another Bill in the future, the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) is also placed on it.

I should like to express my thanks to the Under-Secretary of State for the many civilities and courtesies that he has extended to me, both in Committee and on the Floor of the House. I am heartened by the measures concerning the introduction of closed-circuit television to deal with the evidence given by children in criminal proceedings; however, I am deeply disappointed that the same Minister was unwilling to listen to my argument concerning the use of video-recorded interviews as evidence in criminal proceedings. I fear that, with the advent of the Gracious Speech on 7 November, we will find that we are slipping further behind English legislation in this respect. Nevertheless, with the Under-Secretary's involvement, we have improved the law of Scotland as it affects the interests of young children who are caught up in such horrendous circumstances, and I am grateful to him for that measure at least.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: Those of us who served on the Standing Committee will have many memories that will no doubt be recounted through the ages, not so much because of the contents of the Bill as because of the nature of its passage. The memories include the summoning of members of the Scottish Grand Committee in the Royal High school in Edinburgh to be given talks behind the scenes and long walks up and down the Committee Corridor by the Secretary of State for Scotland and various Ministers with their own Back Benchers. Judging by the expressions on their faces, the Secretary of State sometimes wished that there was a perpendicular structure at the foot of the passage over which he could tip some of his own Back Benchers.

More seriously, let me say that there have been improvements as a result of the Bill; but the way in which it was treated was, in many ways, an insult to the need for law reform in Scotland. Certainly—as one who sees the institution of the Scottish legal system as a major bastion of Scottish nationhood and as an institution of which we are rightly proud—I hope that any future miscellaneous law reform Bills will be just that, and that we shall be able to look in more detail and more effectively at many of the issues that have been left untouched.

I too thank the Minister for his abiding courtesy throughout the many hours in which we have debated. I also congratulate him on being a member of a team that has at least lived up to one of the Prime Minister's requirements. I refer to her request for a "green" image: what would have been a very large statute has been reduced during our proceedings to a much smaller one.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Let me pay tribute to those hon. Members who served on the Committee for more than 80 hours, to the Law Society of Scotland, to the Scottish Consumer Council and other bodies and, of course, to the officials who worked ceaselessly around the clock to ensure that I gave accurate answers to the points raised by Opposition Members. I have no regrets about the considerable number of amendments: I believe that that is parliamentary democracy operating at its best.

Part I of the Bill will help charities by giving them much more information. Part II will help to introduce an element of competition to assist the consumer and will also open up access to the supreme courts for solicitors for the first time in Scottish legal history. Part III will introduce important licensing reforms and stiffen the criteria for late-night extensions, which is a law-and-order measure. Part IV has been discussed extensively today; perhaps the two most important measures concern supervised attendance and video links, which will go a long way towards protecting children.

I thank hon. Members for the part that they have played in the Bill. I believe that it will prove a significant measure for us to look back on in years to come.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Caldey Island Bill

Not amended (in Standing Committee), considered.

ELECTIONS

Amendment made, in page 1, line 23, leave out from 'a' to first 'of' in line 7 on page 2 and insert

'person to be included in the registers of parliament and local government electors published for the years beginning with 16th February 1990 and 16th February 1991—

(a) subsections (1) to (3) above shall be deemed to have been in force on 10th October 1989 and 10th October 1990 (the qualifying dates in relation to those registers);

(b) the reference in section 11(2) of the Representation of the People Act 1983 to the correction of a register shall include a reference to any addition made by virtue of this section; and

(c) the relevant provisions'—[Sir Wyn Roberts.]

Bill reported, with an amendment.

6.49 pm

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Sir Wyn Roberts): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

In Committee, some concern was expressed about clause 2, and I am happy to inform the House of our decision that the Caldey community should become liable for community charge as from 1 April 1991, and that it should also become liable to non-domestic rates as from the same date.

We have also succeeded in devising a good scheme to provide transitional relief for the community. I believe that, on the whole, the islanders will find the total package quite acceptable. Therefore, I have pleasure in commending the Bill to the House.

6.50 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I thank the Minister for his courteous response, as always, to the substantial point that we made in Committee about the imposition of poll tax before the Bill could be passed. I do not imagine that the islanders of Caldey will be desperately pleased at having the poll tax imposed on them in any shape or form, but at least we have saved them from being taxed before the relevant legislation could be enacted, for the Minister has now confirmed that the poll tax will not take effect there before next year.

The Minister said that the Government have devised "a good scheme" to provide the equivalent of transitional relief. We have already made the point that some difficulty arises because there is no previous rating base from which to work. However, the Minister seems to have confirmed his promise to do something about transitional relief, so perhaps he will give us an idea of what it will be.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The scheme that we intend to establish will require the islanders, each year in a four-year transitional period, to pay a fixed percentage of that year's community charge for standard spending—or CCSS. That percentage, which I propose to set at 80 per cent. in 1991-92, will increase over the four-year period so that the islanders will move smoothly into a regime of full charges in 1995-96—the same year that full charges will be payable in the rest of Wales as the general transitional relief scheme comes to an end.

The effect of my proposals into 1991-92 is that, as the Welsh CCSS for next year is £228, the islanders will each pay 80 per cent. of that figure, or £182—and so will in effect receive relief of £46 per head. If the charge actually set is lower than the CCSS, then the islanders will each pay only 80 per cent. of that lower charge. However, if the relevant authorities' spend is such that the charge set exceeds £228, each islander will pay 80 per cent. of the CCSS plus the amount by which the charge set exceeds the CCSS. Therefore, Dyfed county council and South Pembrokeshire district council will want to set their budgets in such a way as to enable the islanders to gain maximum benefit from the scheme that I have described.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I wonder if you could confirm that the Caldey Island Bill which has just been given a Third Reading was a Bill to extend the franchise, and some hon. Members were here to vote on it, but it is a matter of regret that the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) —the area concerned—was apparently unable to make the Lobby in time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): As the hon. Member is aware, hon. Members' attendance in the House has nothing whatsoever to do with the Chair.

Heathrow Express Railway Bill [Lords]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the Promoters of the Heathrow Express Railway Bill [Lords] shall have leave to suspend proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bill, if they think fit, in the next Session of Parliament, provided that the Agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office of their intention to suspend further proceedings not later than the day before the close of the present Session and that all Fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid;

That if the Bill is brought from the Lords in the next Session, the Agents for the Bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration signed by them stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill which was brought from the Lords in the present Session;

That as soon as a certificate by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office, that such a declaration has been so deposited, has been laid upon the Table of the House, the Bill shall be deemed to have been read the first and shall be ordered to be read a second time;

That the Petitions against the Bill presented in the present Session which stand referred to the Committee on the Bill shall stand referred to the Committee on the Bill in the next Session;

That no Petitioners shall be heard before the Committee on the Bill, unless their Petition has been presented within the time limited within the present Session or deposited pursuant to paragraph (b) of Standing Order 126 relating to Private Business;

That in relation to the Bill, Standing Order 127 relating to Private Business shall have effect as if the words "under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of petitions against Bill)" were omitted;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.— [The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

7.6 pm

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): I support the motion standing in the name of the Chairman of Ways and Means that further consideration of the Heathrow Express Railway Bill should be carried over to the next Session of Parliament. Hon. Members may know that the Bill has already been through its stages in the other place. Indeed, throughout discussions, there have been petitioners against the Bill, but at no point have they objected to the concept of what it seeks to do. The Bill was deposited as far back as November 1988, but at no stage in its proceedings has it been delayed or objected to, other than delays caused by the pressure of Bills, which has made it impossible for the Bill to have a Second Reading before the Summer recess started at the end of July.

The Bill aims to provide a straightforward and basic service. During discussions in the Opposed Private Bill Committee in the other place, some substantial changes were made, which I hope will be to the benefit of the people who will use the link and to those who live in the area it will pass through, or who represent it.

I hope that hon. Members will agree that it would be very unfortunate if the Bill were not allowed to complete its stages, as it satisfies an important requirement.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): My hon. Friend says that the Bill will benefit constituents such as mine who live in the area through which the express train will pass. That may be so, but I have not yet received the assurances which I sought from the promoters that the train would stop at least twice a day in Ealing.

If the train cannot be stopped at Greenford, which would be better still, I would settle for a stop at Ealing

Broadway in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young)—at least twice a day, and more often if possible. The promoters have made certain noises about that, as if to say that they will make some concessions to the good citizens of Ealing and the surrounding areas, but so far nothing concrete has come from them. Could my hon. Friend give me some assurance on that matter?

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: As one expects, my hon. Friend speaks with great fluency on a matter that concerns his constituents. No one is a more doughty fighter on behalf of his constituents than he. If he will bear with me for a moment, however, I shall endeavour to deal with the point that he made about stopping trains on the link. It is a matter of concern not only to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) but also to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) and others.

At this stage I want to establish the Bill's credentials —how far it has come and how it has been held up by events that are not directly related to the arguments that might be deployed when considering the clauses. The Bill is jointly promoted and jointly financed by Heathrow Airport Ltd., which is a wholly owned subsidiary of British Airports Authority and British Rail. The Bill aims to satisfy a real need—a fast, dedicated service between the capital and its principal airport. That is in line with thinking throughout the rest of Europe.

Many might reasonably ask why such a service has not been provided before this. I am among those who believe that we should have had something along these lines a long time ago. The Bill is a direct response to the Government's White Paper of 1985 that dealt with airport policy. The Heathrow surface access study, commissioned by the Department of Transport, followed in 1987. An evaluation of the consultations on that document followed in June 1988. Immediately after those consultations had been brought to a successful conclusion, the Bill was deposited—in November 1988. It is in response to a direct demand by all those concerned. No time has been wasted by those who wish to provide the service.

The underground service, the airbus, cars and taxis provide other means of getting to Heathrow airport, but those of us who know this part of England well recognise that road congestion is a great problem. A dedicated service would therefore be a great bonus. It would be a premium service. The promoters are seeking by means of the Bill to provide a fast premium service to enable travellers, who are prepared to pay a fare of approximately £6, to have fast transport straight into the airport.

Sir Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): It will, of course, provide a very good service, but is my hon. Friend aware that most people want to travel by car to the airport and that the new service will not relieve the congestion on the M4, as has been suggested?

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: My hon. Friend uses the M4 to reach his constituency. Although I use it a great deal, he must use it more than I do. I realise that it is a very crowded route, but that applies to almost every other motorway that runs into and out of London. It surely cannot be denied that we need the best possible public service links from the capital to the airport if we are to alleviate the problem to which my hon. Friend has just referred.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I know that my hon. Friend is an avid reader of all my publications. Therefore, I am sure that he will have read in bed "Tunnel Vision", in which I have tried to deal with the problem. I stress in particular the need for a west-facing link. If I catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, I hope to be able to refer to it and to deal with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Sir A. Glyn). The contents of the Bill deal only with traffic from London, although that is not clear from the long title. The procedural point that I wish to put to my hon. Friend is this: is he of the opinion that, if the promoters succeed in obtaining the agreement of the House to this carry-over motion, they will be amenable to some of the proposals that may emerge during the debate?

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: My hon. Friend has made an important point. He is an acknowledged expert on these matters. It leads me straight to the point that was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North and others: that the link with Heathrow should not be unique to that service, and that others should be able to take advantage of the line that will start at Paddington. I have to make the point, which applies to hon. Members with constituencies in Wales and elsewhere, that, although the promoters are seeking, by means of the Bill, powers to construct the basic route, they have not closed their minds to the point that has just been made by my hon. Friend. They have not disregarded, either, the pleas that have been made by other hon. Members. When the line is in operation, all sorts of options can be examined. However, we are considering a Bill that provides only a basic service.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): So the answer is no.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: I am not so sure that the hon. Gentleman is right about that. If one were coming from Cardiff, or from anywhere else in Wales, which I know extremely well, one would probably be better off to go to Paddington and pick up the dedicated line to Heathrow rather than have to face all the confusion and problems that could exist—I do not say that they would exist—with stopping trains of any sort.

Another fundamental point is that, following the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport about London's east-west crosslink, there will be occasions when people from the eastern side of the capital will want to take advantage of a train that goes straight into the airport. British Rail and the British Airports Authority have made it clear that they are anxious to look at that point. The important point, however, is that the time scale of the two projects is totally different. The airport link with which we are dealing this evening is designed to be operational by 1994, whereas the east-west crosslink is unlikely to be available until 1999 —a five-year gap.

Mr. Harry Greenway: I promise my hon. Friend that I shall not persist with my interruptions, so I hope that he will be kind enough to allow me this one. My hon. Friend is, I know, an honourable man. However, he is asking the House to accept the good faith of the promoters and to agree in due course to the construction of the line. He says that, when it is operational, the promoters will consider pleas made by others, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and myself, for a proper stop at Ealing at certain times of the day.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. We are at the commencement of the debate. I must remind the House that this is a carry-over motion. We are not debating the arguments for and against the Bill. I hope that hon. Members will keep in mind the fact that this is a narrow procedural motion.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for your ruling.

Mr. Greenway rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman had completed what he wanted to say. He was going off the rails in a very big way.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: We must bear in mind that this is not a Second Reading debate, but I hope that I carry the House with me when I say that a Second Reading debate will be needed on a future occasion. I have taken note, however, of my hon. Friend's point.

There are still 15 petitioners against the Bill. According to the motion on the Order Paper, those petitions will be carried over to the new Session.

As I pointed out at the outset, the petitioners have no objection in general to the concept of the rail link that is being promoted. They are concerned about individual special interests which, hopefully, can be discussed in Committee if the Bill is sufficiently lucky to be given a Second Reading.

It is worth remembering that the original Bill introduced in the other place conceived the likelihood of an overhead rail viaduct across the M4 and into airport terminals 3 and 4. As a result of the discussions in the opposed Committee in the other place, the promoters have decided to go under that motorway and, hopefully, improve the environmental appearance of the operation and meet the important points made by the objectors. As a result of that decision, they have probably added about £25 million to the cost. Therefore, we have already seen in discussions on the Bill that substantial changes can be made.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): My hon. Friend mentioned an increase of £25 million. The paper produced by the promoters mentions the figure of £12 million. I want to help my hon. Friend and ensure that he has got the figures right, because we should not give the wrong information in this debate.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: The figure I have is £25 million. If my hon. Friend has another figure, we must discuss that later. However, if one were to look at the possibility of burying the line still further, we would be looking at a further increase of about £10 million, which would have a detrimental effect on the fare structure to which I have referred.

I hope that the House will agree that this is an important matter and that it should receive further consultation and discussion. It should be allowed to have a Second Reading during the next Session and then proceed to its Committee and other stages. Therefore, I commend the motion.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): I must plead a constituency interest in this matter and remind the House that I am a former railway worker. I know every inch of the railway. If we go back far enough, I was a goods guard and shunter. When the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) made a plea for a stop at Ealing Common, it reminded me of someone who asked me whether a train stopped at Paddington. I said, "Blimey, madam, if it doesn't, there won't 'alf be a row." I support a stop at Ealing Broadway, and my constituents want a stop at Southall. In that part of my constituency there is a large Indian community and many employees of Heathrow airport. Of course, it is for the Bill's promoters to decide whether they want to resist the idea of stops. It might contradict the title of the Bill.

I want more information about the speed of the trains, because they will fundamentally affect my constituents in west Ealing. Already work is being undertaken on track laying in conjunction with the new high-speed train. Some of the houses near that area are nearly 100 years old and already suffer vibration from the existing services. In some of the houses, pictures jump about on the walls. A high-speed service to Heathrow at 15-minute intervals will not do much to improve their lives. I understand that British Rail has had a discussion with local residents. Those residents have said that it is the last thing they want, since there is about 25 ft. between the back of houses and the railway track, and the embankment is to be raised to bedroom height. I do not think that many hon. Members would want to live in that part of the London borough of Ealing.

I must take this opportunity to spell out some of the worries of my constituents. However, in accordance with the spirit in which the hon. Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson) introduced the Bill, I must say that in general terms there is a welcome for the idea.

Mr. Dicks: Will the hon. Gentleman say exactly where in his constituency the line rises to the height of windows? I bow to his expertise on the railways but I was under the impression that that would happen as the train was leaving Hayes, not Southall.

Mr. Bidwell: I used to be a resident of Hayes and this matter never worried me when I lived there, so the hon. Gentleman probably knows more about it than I do. Although I often motor and walk around that area, I am sure that he knows more than I do about the spur extension near his constituency and across Stockley industrial estate.

There was a derailment last year very close to the houses I have mentioned, but miraculously there was no loss of life. An express train from Oxford to Paddington hit a piece of rail which it was thought may have been left by vandals, although that has never been proved. When such things occur, residents adjacent to the line must be fearful, especially with the prospect of increased traffic, even though on a quieter track.

Nobody has told me that they are powerfully opposed to the idea, and I would expect British Rail, backed up by the British Airports Authority—which is rolling in money—to be generous if the question of compensation for my constituents arises in the future. I am sure that they will want to be generous, because it is not simply a matter of increased use of the existing track with traditional express trains to Reading, south Wales and so on. If the enterprise is to be thought to be worthwhile, they will want a service of Gatwick-Victoria proportions.

I promised that I would raise this matter. I think that there will be further consultation with British Rail, and the British Airports Authority should be present at such consultations. They should look further at the worries and fears of those in my constituency who will be affected. As far as I know, no one will suffer such oppression, although I am sure that my colleague, the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), will tell us differently. The old houses I have mentioned must be considered seriously. If they are not, I shall lead a protest greater than has been known hitherto.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I welcome the principle of the motion and the potential progress of the Bill. I welcome the introduction of the debate by my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson) who is standing in for my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) who has ultimate charge of the progress of the Bill on behalf of the promoters. My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South has been particularly helpful to Westminster city council in recognising my constituents' special concerns because of the proximity of Paddington to the residential community.

If the House is minded to pass the motion, I hope that in future greater consideration will be given to the environmental aspect of the Bill as it affects the city of Westminster. My council has asked me to make clear that it is concerned about the impact that traffic may have should the Bill progress. Much growth is already expected in traffic movements to the A40 and the M40 extension, growth is predicted in general traffic and railway patronage of Paddington and there are estimates of a growth of traffic to Heathrow.

Mr. Adley: I fully understand and support what my hon. Friend is saying. Does he agree not only that his constituents are entitled to the protection for which he is asking but that he is entitled to suggest—if he does not do so, I will, and he might agree with me—that environmental expenditure to alleviate the problems faced by people because of railway schemes should be funded in exactly the same way as environmental expenditure is provided to alleviate problems created by road schemes? If there is an environmental problem, the taxpayer should pay, not the promoters of the Bill.

Sir John Wheeler: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention, but it is not for me to express an opinion on the merits of his argument. That is, perhaps, for elsewhere or for another time in this Chamber.

My support for the principle of the Bill and the motion rests on the assumption that the promoters will continue to consider the traffic and environmental impact in the city of Westminster. In particular, they will want to focus their attention on access to Paddington station via what is described as "a sub-standard ramp off Bishop's bridge road which requires cars to stop and proceed at 4 mph."

I am advised that considerable progress is being made by the promoters to satisfy the council and particularly residential environmental groups such as the south-east Bayswater residents association. Should that progress continue to be made, I have no doubt that the Bill will be greatly welcomed.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): What is the view of the hon. Gentleman and his council about the existing underground connections at Paddington? Does he feel that an additional 6 million passengers through Paddington main line station may cause enormous difficulties unless underground facilities are considerably improved?

Sir John Wheeler: That, again, goes beyond my ability to comment tonight and is a matter for elsewhere.

The Bill is greatly affected by the proposal to provide the east-west cross way, which may have the advantage of reducing potential vehicular traffic to Paddington railway station. That announcement impacts favourably on the environmental aspect of the Bill and I very much hope, therefore, that the motion will be supported tonight.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I am uncertain whether to support the motion and will therefore need certain assurances from the sponsor of the Bill before reaching a decision.

I need not explain why a Welshman should speak to the Bill or seek those assurances. Paddington, with which this expressway will connect, is important not only to my personal life, given the amount of time that I spend going to and from it, but to the commercial and business community of south Wales. High-speed access to Paddington station is a vital factor in the industrial and commercial development of the Principality.

The best architectural sight in London is Paddington from a departing train. I say that not as a personal whim but because that station and the line to south Wales play a significant role in the economic well-being of south Wales. If, therefore, there is to be any disruption, even for a short period, to the high-speed link between London and south Wales—I shall draw the attention of the House to that possibility in a minute—it will be a matter of profound concern not only for hon. Members and their personal convenience but for the economic and commercial development of the Principality.

A vivid example that has concerned us about key life-line communication links is the state of the Severn bridge. The fact that it has been in a state of repair, refurbishment or alteration for a long time has had an important impact on attracting industry and commerce to the Principality. We therefore have every right to be worried, and before supporting the motion I shall need assurances from the sponsor of the Bill about the nature and character of the works and the impact that a new expressway might have on the speed with which the main 125 service from south Wales travels in and out of Paddington.

Let me explain some of my basic worries, which were not raised on Second Reading or Third Reading in the other place. Following an inquiry with the Private Bill Office in the other place, I do not believe that they were the subject of detailed discussion or cross-examination in the Committee proceedings in the other place. The first of my worries is the impact that a new 15-minute service from Paddington between 5 am and 11.30 pm might have on existing and future traffic to and from Paddington. If I do not receive some reassurance from the sponsor that our worries and concerns will be taken on board, that will influence how I vote.

Those of us who spend a considerable part of our lives on this line——

Mr. Morgan: Who almost live on it.

Mr. Rowlands: Almost.

Many times, the 125 has been on time until the last three or four miles into Paddington station. Those last three or four miles cause the delays. About 90 per cent. of delays occur in that vital three or four miles into Paddington. One of the possible consequences of supporting the motion would be to add another 15-minute service in and out of Paddington from 5 am to 11.30 pm. I have not found any evidence from the proceedings on the Bill showing that the ripple effects that this new service might have on the speed of the 125 service in and out of Paddington have been investigated.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: As this is not Second Reading I shall not be seeking leave to speak again, but the promoters have assured me that current services will not be disadvantaged as a result of the Heathrow link. That is the best assurance that I can give the hon. Gentleman. If the motion is passed, he will have an opportunity to raise this matter in more detail on Second Reading.

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I am glad that he has already understood that vital point. There was little evidence in the debate in the other place that it had been taken on board; it was, understandably, very much a London debate. The Bill has much wider significance, especially in terms of the Welsh economy. I hope that the word will go out to the promoters that we will seek detailed and categorical assurances. As I understand it, the new 15-minute service will be provided on existing lines and there are no plans to build new lines into the Paddington area. This point has not been dealt with in the necessary detail.

I understand from my reading that a great deal of the construction will not take place immediately around the main line. I do not believe that a scheme of such importance will not cause considerable disruption on and around the existing railway tracks into and out of Paddington, especially in areas about which Conservative Members can speak with greater knowledge. I ask the hon. Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson) to say that he will take this matter back to the promoters. We need an assurance about construction. The high-speed 125s travelling from the south-west and south Wales are vital to economic development and to inward investment in our community. We want an assurance that the construction will not affect their speed.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: The hon. Gentleman has made an important point, about which the promoters are concerned. The assurance has been given—to me, at any rate—that the service will in no way disadvantage main line trains travelling to Paddington from south Wales and other parts of the country.

Mr. Rowlands: I value that intervention. Obviously we shall seek to put flesh on that assurance later.

It would be galling for us to lose the speed and the efficiency of one of the major lifelines from the Principality to the capital. Many of us have suggested that British Rail should consider electrifying western lines as it has done along the east coast. It would be galling to watch construction of an electrified portion of the line in the west if construction slows services from and to the south-west and south Wales for a significant period. One can imagine the irritation and anger that could result. I am grateful to the hon. Member for New Forest for accepting that this is an important point.

I am concerned also about possible linkages between the new expressway and traffic coming from south Wales and the south-west. The hon. Member for New Forest said that the Bill's promoters were open minded. It will be galling if we are left with a service from south Wales to Heathrow that involves getting off at Reading, getting on a bus and, if one is lucky, reaching one of the Heathrow terminals 45 minutes later, then spending a considerable time running round the four terminals. It also takes a lot of time to get out of Heathrow before one can set on one's way towards Reading to catch the mainline service.

On balance, I am inclined not to oppose the carry-over motion because of the comments by the hon. Member for New Forest. We give due notice, however, that we will raise the issue of the connection between the railway service from south Wales to Heathrow and Paddington and the ways in which the benefits of a major, new communications infrastructure can be tied to the Principality's requirements. We feel that we are a long way from the channel tunnel; we are determined not to be a long way from London or Heathrow.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I should like on behalf of the whole House, I hope, to thank my hon. and neighbouring Friend the Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson). Over the years, he has taken immense trouble with railway Bills and he is always courteous, diligent and thorough. We are grateful to him yet again, and we are grateful for his attempts to answer questions.

We have a problem. This procedural motion involves a group that is partly financed by a nationalised industry, which presumably accounts for the presence of the Minister on the Front Bench. We shall all try to keep within order, but it is difficult to decide whether to support this motion without assurances from my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest or my hon. Friend the Minister on some points.

I have to declare an interest as the author of "Tunnel Vision" which the Hansard reporters could not seem to see, so I shall hold it up for them. It was published by the Conservative Political Centre and was purchased by certain Labour Members. A long time ago, the book foresaw many of the points that we are discussing. I declare an interest also as author of a recently published book "Out of Steam", which also attends to questions of railway investment criteria.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest asks us to support the Bill. Paragraph (4) of the preamble states:

> "In order to provide improved services and facilities for passengers travelling to or from Heathrow".

I submit that, before the Bill completes its passage, the words "from central London" should be inserted. Preferably—I strongly echo the words of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands)—the Bill should provide what is proposed in paragraph (4). Unless the Bill is amended, a great opportunity will be lost.

A west-facing link must be a vital feature of the Bill for south Wales, the west country and the south-west. Of course we accept the assurances given by my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, but surely the time when the Bill is being promoted is the time for the promoters to say that they will acquire the necessary land. We are talking about 200 or 300 yd of land on which to build west-facing tracks and that land should be reserved now. I have not yet heard an assurance from my hon. Friend on that point.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: As I said, this is not a Second Reading debate, but I should like to make the point that the promoters want to ensure that the link between the capital and the airport is preserved as a premium rail route. If we are to have stopping trains or any alterations to that basic principle, obviously different objectives will have to be considered. I have already assured the House that those objectives are being considered. Finally, I should emphasise that it will probably be as quick to go to Paddington and get on to the dedicated line as it would be to have stopping trains on what is intended to be a fast premium service.

Mr. Adley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, but I should point out to him that people who are travelling —whether to Baghdad or to Bangkok—with lots of luggage will not take kindly to finding themselves whizzing past Heathrow at 125 mph on a high speed train from Swansea, watching the airport disappear behind them, getting off at Paddington and taking all their luggage from platform A to platform B, only to go back on themselves.

Following on from the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Sir A. Glyn), I suspect that unless a determined decision is made at the outset of the Bill's proceedings both to provide and utilise modern technology and to provide for the acquisition of the necessary extra land—I shall touch on that in a moment—the Bill will face considerable difficulties as we proceed.

This is not a hybrid Bill, but it is the result of a hybrid promotion: it is being promoted partly by a recently privatised company and partly by a state-owned company. Sooner or later—and before we proceed much further with the Bill—someone will have to recognise that a public transport opportunity will be missed unless the matter is dealt with properly. We need a transport policy that recognises opportunities. We need the electrification of the Great Western main line— thank goodness Brunel built it to the 7 ft gauge, otherwise we should not now have enough land to do what the promoters envisage in the Bill —not just from Paddington to Heathrow but from the proposed Heathrow junction to Reading and Oxford and to Banbury and Coventry. We need the line to be connected with the electrified rail network throughout the country.

I must point out to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest that people like through trains. They do not like having to change, especially if they are travelling with a lot of luggage. To build a new piece of railway line at a cost of many tens of millions of pounds and not to capitalise on the opportunities being created is a dereliction of duty.

Have the promoters considered the use of modern technology for powered slip coaches? The hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) will remember that the Great Western used to slip coaches in steam days. In those days, one could not do what one can now do with electric and diesel power, which is to slip a self-powered unit. Can my hon. Friend tell me whether that has already been considered, or whether it will be borne in mind when the promoters consider the west-facing link?

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: I am not competent, Madam Deputy Speaker, to answer questions about advanced technology on the railways in this debate: it is not a Second Reading debate. My only concern is that we should move to the point at which the interesting arguments deployed by my hon. Friend can be given a proper opportunity to be discussed—namely, a Second Reading debate in the next Session.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should again draw the attention of the House to the fact that we are not discussing the Bill. We are discussing the motion on the Order Paper, which deals with the question whether we should suspend proceedings on the Bill. We are talking not about the Bill but about a suspension motion and it would make my job a little easier if hon. Members would relate their remarks to that from time to time.

Mr. Adley: I shall relate my remarks to that from time to time, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The present Bill is a private Bill, but it will be funded in part by the nationalised railway industry. We cannot simply disregard the Bill's national transport implications. I shall endeavour not to incur your wrath, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I do not have a great deal more to say, but the point is that this is a private Bill based on the use and exploitation of a public asset—the Great Western railway main line.

On that basis, the promoters must be made aware that they cannot just take advantage of the opportunities of financial reward; they must be made to be responsible for the public interest in their use of a priceless national asset. That is why I ask my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest—or perhaps the Minister can answer this question —whether the promoters or the Department have made any sort of cost-benefit analysis not only of what is in the Bill but of the aspects that the promoters might reasonably have assumed hon. Members would raise at this stage in the debate.

My hon. Friend the Minister may not know this yet, but a number of us have had a wasted year. We have been discussing with British Rail the future of the Waterloo-Salisbury-Exeter line. We were promised a cost-benefit analysis and then, at the eleventh hour, British Rail had to admit that it had been told by the Department of Transport not to go ahead with such an analysis. How on earth can the Department of Transport forbid a nationalised railway industry to undertake a cost-benefit analysis? For this Bill, such an analysis is essential.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Roger Freeman): Although it is not directly relevant to the motion, Madam Deputy Speaker, I must tell my hon. Friend that he has been misled. At no stage did the Department of Transport suggest to British Rail that a cost-benefit analysis should not be performed.

Mr. Adley: When my colleagues and I come to see the Minister, we shall pursue the matter. Certainly, that was the clear impression that we received from British Rail in the course of our meetings with it.

We are being asked to approve a carry-over motion for half a Bill. Where else but in Britain could it seriously be proposed to build a rail link from the nation's major airport facing in one direction only? The proposed new construction comprises a spur from the Great Western main line into Heathrow. The spur faces eastbound only. The Heathrow Express Railway Bill, welcome in itself, highlights dramatically everything that is wrong with transport planning in this country.

Passengers from the west country and south Wales—from Bristol, Cardiff, Swansea, Gloucester, Swindon—who wish to use the Heathrow link will have to travel into Paddington passing the new link-line; then transfer themselves and their luggage from platform X to platform Y at Paddington; then travel back on themselves to Heathrow. Leaving aside the time wasted and the aggravation of whizzing past one's destination and continuing in the wrong direction, the inevitable result of this situation is that large numbers of potential rail travellers to Heathrow from the west country will still go by coach and car, thus failing to ease congestion and pollution.

The obvious common sense of building a westbound spur into Heathrow has escaped planners of the new line, or, more likely, has failed to attract them as commercially worth while. No questions are asked about the perceived national interest, the obvious regional advantages or simple transport logistics.

Can anyone imagine the Department of Transport proposing a new motorway link road which faced in one direction only? To ask the question is to answer it. This highlights only too well the fundamental difference in road and rail planning in this country. For roads, money is no object. The taxpayer pays and that is the end of the story. For railway development, whether publicly or privately funded, no such rules apply. If it is not commercially viable, it is not built.

When British Rail announced its intention to build a high-speed link from the channel tunnel to central London, the nation demanded—quite properly—that full environmental protection be given to those who might be adversely affected. The Government so instructed British Rail: but they have failed to provide funds for the environmental protection. Somehow British Rail—alone amongst western European railways—is expected simultaneously to behave like a commercial organisation and a national environmental benefactor.

Contrast that with the saga of the Winchester by-pass. Quite appropriately, again, the Department demands sensible environmental protection: the taxpayer pays; no questions asked; end of story. Unless and until the same investment criteria are applied by the Department of Transport and the Treasury to road and rail investment, Britain's railway developments will be based on the foundation of Victorian engineering by our forebears, whilst our industrial competitors in Europe are busy building new railways as well as improving their existing infrastructure. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest will pass my thoughts on to the promoters in full and that he will be able to assure me that, before we proceed any further with the Bill, these matters will be raised with the Department of Transport——

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: The points that my hon. Friend has raised are exactly the points that should be raised in a Second Reading debate. I very much hope that the House will allow the Bill to be carried over so that that debate can take place and so that my hon. Friend can deploy his interesting arguments.

Mr. Harry Greenway: I shall have considerable doubts about supporting the carry-over motion unless proper attention is paid to the environmental aspects of the Bill to which my hon. Friend has referred. In my constituency, we need safeguards to prevent children from getting on to the line because they can do so all too easily—[Interruption.] Well, this is fundamental to my attitude and to whether I vote for the carry-over motion——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that it is, but I must advise the hon. Gentleman that it is not fundamental to the——

Mr. Greenway rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not fundamental to the carry-over motion. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will seek to speak in the debate and I shall wish to call him so that he can speak to the motion.

Mr. Greenway: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. How can one decide whether to support the carry-over motion without making the fundamental points that had been put before one by one's constituents in support of the ultimate Bill?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. If we should reach Second Reading, that is when the hon. Gentleman should put his points. He is now anticipating a Second Reading debate in which he will be able to determine how he will vote on the Bill.

Mr. Adley: May I conclude my speech, Madam Deputy Speaker? I do so by saying that, in view of my long, close and happy relationship with my neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, I shall support the carry-over motion because he has assured me that my points will be taken into account. The Minister has also listened to all the debate. I therefore hope that, before the Bill receives its Second Reading, those of us who support it but who wish to see it amended will be able to seek a meeting with my hon. Friend the Minister to pursue some of these points, preferably on an all-party basis.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): The debate has been interesting, whether in or out of order. The fact that so many hon. Members of all parties have expressed their legitimate concerns about the progress of the Bill shows that, if and when we reach Second Reading, the hon. Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson), who moved the motion with his customary diligence and courtesy, will face considerable cross-examination. I have no wish to arouse your ire, Madam Deputy Speaker, by transgressing the rules because, were I to do so, I should suffer in a way in which other hon. Members would not, because you would have ample opportunities to tell me so in West Bromwich, as well as in the House.

I should like to give my party's attitude to the motion and, if we have a Second Reading debate, to present our views on the Bill as a whole. The way in which the Bill is being promoted is indicative of the lack of any transport policy under this Government and of the illogical thinking of many Conservative Members. Over the past 11 years, the Government have continually said that British Rail must divest itself of what Conservative Members term its "superfluous activities". Those aspects of the railway network that were built up by the former private railway companies and run by British Rail since 1948, such as the shipping and hotel services, have been removed from British Rail during the past decade because the Conservative party has said that British Rail should concentrate on running the railway system.

Nevertheless, Conservative Members are here presumably prepared to support a Bill that is promoted jointly by the former British Airports Authority—now BAA plc—and British Rail. The Bill has little to do with operating an airport, but everything to do with running a railway. If the British Airports Authority—or whatever it calls itself these days—can build a railway, surely a railway system can be involved in the ancillary services from which it has profited and which have been seen as a necessary adjunct to that system for more than 100 years. To say the least, it is illogical for the Conservative party to support the carry-over motion, given the way in which the Government have behaved towards British Rail and some of its activities during the past 11 years.

The most worrying aspect of the provisions is that, if the forecasts of the hon. Member for New Forest prove accurate, 6 million people will be using the mainline station in London which is probably the least suitable to carry that additional burden. When I suggested to the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) who, alas, is no longer in his place, that that state of affairs should worry Westminster city council and himself, he replied that it was a matter for Second Reading. However, he also referred to the east-west crossrail which, if it is ever built, will have a substantial impact and will relieve Paddington station of that additional burden.

I realise that the Minister of State has not been at the Department of Transport very long and that he seems to have been shunted into this branch line, but I must advise him that some of the Department's pronouncements are difficult to believe. Earlier this year we had an announcement from British Rail about the modernisation of the railway line to Glasgow, but we are now told that that will not happen because of the economic situation. Furthermore, the Secretary of State and the Minister of State were very much aware of the fears of some of my hon. Friends—and, to be fair, of some Conservative Members—about the additional burden that would be placed on Paddington station if the motion were adopted.

Miraculously, at the Conservative party conference—a strange forum to make such an announcement—and in a vain attempt to produce the standing ovation which I always thought was customary on such occasions, although obviously I was wrong, the Secretary of State produced the east-west crossrail out of his top hat at an estimated cost of £1·5 billion but said nothing about the source of the funding. When the present Secretary of State produces such a white rabbit from his top hat before that particular forum, I think that it is a job for a good vet because I am not sure whether the animal is genuine. Both Siegfried and Tristan from "All Creatures Great and Small" would have an interesting time examining that white rabbit. The Minister of State owes it to the House to tell us whether the funding for the east-west crossrail will be forthcoming because the Opposition's attitude to the motion may well depend on that central point.

Mr. Freeman: I do not wish to detain the House later if I catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. The east-west crossrail will be funded in the conventional way by the Department of Transport by way of grant, in just the same way as the Jubilee line will be financed. Turning to the west-coast main line, I must advise the hon. Gentleman that he should not believe what he reads in the newspapers. That project has not been cancelled. As I understand it, it is still very much in British Rail's plans.

Mr. Snape: If I said that it had been cancelled, I was wrong. I thought that I said that it had been delayed or postponed. We now read that British Rail is talking about an additional year of delay before bringing forward those plans.

Let us concentrate on the Bill——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I was wondering whether my hon. Friend could pursue this a little more quickly. Shall we be able to get from Glasgow to London quicker before we can get from Paddington to Heathrow that little bit quicker?

Mr. Snape: I have no doubt that, having heard that comment, the Minister of State will reply suitably to it if he succeeds in catching your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The real fears expressed by hon. Members of all parties about the motion and the logical conclusion of its acceptance should be considered carefully both by the promoters and by the Department of Transport. It is not just a question of BAA plc and British Rail dividing the £235 million cost in the way in which they have outlined with 80 per cent. being met by BAA plc and, as I understand it, 20 per cent. by British Rail. In an ideal world, the Department of Transport would say that this should be a joint partnership. If the Minister of State would like to take the weight of speaking for the nation on his undoubtedly broad shoulders, he should say, "We, the nation, must be involved in a project of this size." It does not make sense merely to connect the nearest London terminal station to Heathrow airport. We must do far more than that and ensure that if and when the new rail link is built it becomes an integral part of our overall railway system. Such a piecemeal, begging-bowl approach to these matters bedevils our transport industry and amply illustrates what is wrong with the Government's lack of a transport policy.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Is it not also nonsensical that an important railway development should apparently depend on British Rail being able to flog off some land to obtain the revenue to inject into the project? It might find itself in the same position as it was in at King's Cross. The land that it proposed to sell was suddenly declared to belong to a hospital and had to be returned to that hospital instead of being used for development land—a classic example of depending on the vagaries of property development for important projects.

Mr. Snape: Exactly. The overall economic situation, grim as it is, also has an impact on the amount of cash that British Rail can raise from the sale of its land. This is the only nation on earth that would approach projects of this size and complexity in this way. It is nonsensical that British Rail should have to flog off parcels of land to find the money to invest in a railway line which should have been built decades ago.

Mr. Adley: Will the hon. Gentleman come to the point about the west-facing link? In case I did not make myself clear, does he agree that if the same had been done by road, it would have been announced when the M4 was being built that there would be a link from the M4 to central London but that the traffic coming in by road would have to go right into central London, round Hyde Park corner and back out again?

Mr. Snape: That amply illustrates the nonsensical approach that the Government always adopt.

I should not want the House to think that I am being too hostile to the British Airports Authority. Without its contribution, the link would never be built under the present Government because British Rail would have great difficulty proving that there would be a proper return on the capital. No doubt it would have to parcel up even more tracts of land throughout the country to finance the link, assuming that the Secretary of State or the Minister of State gave it permission to spend its own money.

To return to the point made by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), a similar situation arose with the Manchester airport rail link. That is being built by BR, although it can only afford to build a north-facing junction. It has supposedly reserved enough land to be able, when it has parcelled off and sold another piece of land, to build a south-facing junction some time in the future. Those are the economics of bedlam and the railways of the madhouse.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does my hon. Friend accept that at least the promoters of the Manchester Bill had the honesty to include in that Bill the north and south links? Although it is sad that the south link is not being built at the same time, at least the parliamentary powers exist to build it and it can be lobbied for. The sad thing about this Bill is that there is no sign of a west link in it. All the signs are that the promoters are determined not to have one.

Mr. Snape: That is probably right. Looking at the scheme from the promoters' narrow angle, I do not believe that they want a west link. They want their own dedicated train service running every 15 minutes between Paddington and Heathrow. They would regard the addition of trains from the west country as an intrusion on their private railway. That is what is wrong with the system. Even if land is reserved for a west-facing junction, there is no guarantee that under the present 80-20 system of ownership the junction would ever be laid. Given the habitual incompetence of much of British Rail's senior management, they would miss an opportunity like that if they were given the chance.

It is hard to imagine the BAA seeking additional trains from the west country because the authority would regard them as trespassing on its private piece of railway. The BAA also says that because the new station at Heathrow is under ground it will be unsuitable for the diesel trains —HSTs or diesel multiple units—which now operate on the former Great Western main line. As the hon. Member for Christchurch would tell us, that is an argument for electrification, but so far as I am aware the Government have no plans to electrify the Great Western main line. So unless common sense prevails and there is a change of heart by the Government we shall be stuck with a private piece of railway—[Interruption.] I wish the Minister would persuade some of the people who sit in the civil servants' Box, and who have been giving him doubtful advice, not to shake their heads when an Opposition Member is speaking. After all, it is their advice on which successive Ministers have relied for so many years, which explains why our transport network is in such a mess.

I hope that before the House accepts this motion it will look again at some of the points that have been raised. Perhaps we should reconsider the signalling system in and out of Paddington—a point mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney—which I believe is still controlled from an old oak signal box dating from the late 1960s. I do not know whether that system can be improved to cater for these additional trains without impinging on the existing mainline service from Paddington. If the experience of Birmingham is anything to go by, it cannot, because we have enormous problems with additional capacity into Birmingham New Street station, where the signalling system dates from the 1960s. With its habitual short-sightedness, British Rail senior management ripped up every additional piece of track that it could, so life is extremely difficult now that capacity needs to be increased in the way that many of us had warned that it would.

There are still many unanswered questions. Although the hon. Member for New Forest has done his best to answer them, hon. Members on both sides need more reassurance. If this is to be a small private railway run purely for the benefit of Heathrow airport, it will not have the support of the Opposition or, I suspect, of many Conservative Members.

8.17 pm

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Roger Freeman): I apologise to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) for any apparent discourtesy by officials—it was not meant. From my knowledge of officials in the Department of Transport, I can say that they would serve any Government of any party fully and faithfully, and I assure him that their views about the facts are in no way intended to be discourteous.

The Government support the procedural motion because we support the principle of the Bill: a new, fast, electrified line from the nation's capital to the nation's major airport. As my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson) rightly pointed out, prospects of connections beyond, once the east-west crossrail is completed—we hope by the end of the decade, although British Rail cannot yet have fully thought through the details—open up, for instance, between the airport and other places in the nation's capital and further afield. That is an exciting prospect, made possible by the announcement on the crossrail.

Mr. Cryer: As the Government have no plans to electrify the former Great Western main line out of Paddington, does the Minister envisage a dedicated track to Heathrow as the sole electrified track out of Paddington? Does not that militate against any use of the Heathrow railway by other traffic?

Mr. Freeman: I do not want to stray into secondary issues. Of course, an electrified track coming off the main line to Heathrow would preclude—although this is not for me to say—a diesel service coming from the west country, for reasons of railway safety. That is a matter of common sense, although it is not for discussion in this debate. As the hon. Gentleman has rightly said, all points west of the junction with the main line would have to be electrified to provide a west-facing service. The line to Reading will be electrified on the east-west crossrail. However, no submission or decision has been made by British Rail about the electrification of the whole of the Great Western line.

Mr. Adley: Is the Minister saying that the east-west crossrail rail will have full overhead electrification to Reading? If that is the case, it is extremely welcome news which I must have missed.

Mr. Freeman: Planning permission for an east-west crossrail has to come before the House if that procedure is adopted. That is the principle behind the proposal. I should be happy to meet hon. Members to understand more fully some of the points that have been made. They are not directly germane to the motion or the principle of the Bill.

I note the pressure for stops on the line, especially in Ealing, and the arguments for a west-facing service. I also note what hon. Members have said about the implications for the existing service at Paddington station. Those are all important matters and I give an undertaking to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and to other hon. Members that at any time from tomorrow onwards I should be happy to meet them to understand their concerns more fully. In the meantime, the Government support the motion because we support the principle of the Bill.

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): The Minister mentioned links in other directions. Will he include in his undertaking a willingness to discuss the possibility of keeping open links to the south by constructing the tunnels under the airport, because the points that he has made apply in the same way to links to the south as to links in other directions?

Mr. Freeman: I note what my hon. and learned Friend says. The Department of Transport does not run the railways. This is a private Bill and it is for British Rail to make investment proposals to the Government. If my hon. and learned Friend cares to join my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch in a meeting with me or cares to see me separately, I should be glad to listen to his arguments.

8.21 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Did the Minister say that the cross-London link will be electrified from Reading? If that is the case, the west link is much more feasible. The Minister is nodding, from which I take it that the line will be electrified from Reading to the centre of London.

I oppose the carry-over motion because it is a totally inappropriate way for us to proceed in this matter. It is clear from the debate that we are concerned about three major areas. One is a national transport policy, the second relates to environmental issues for people close to the proposed link, and the third is about how well petitioners can be represented.

It is inappropriate for us to deal with transport policy by way of a private Bill which can always be narrowed as it goes through Parliament. However, it can never be widened. The perfectly reasonable proposals about the west link could not possibly be introduced to the Bill at any stage because the promoters would have had to give notice to local people and it is possible that petitions would have been raised. Such a procedure enables us to discuss only a narrow part of transport policy.

We should throw out the Bill. We have already spent a long time on it, but the Government should start again. Instead of using a private Bill, the Government should present their own measure which would give us an opportunity to discuss all the transport implications in the same way as the House is able to scrutinise public Bills. That is much more satisfactory than the way in which we scrutinise private Bills.

Mr. Snape: I realise that my hon. Friend's objections to the Bill are procedural rather than on the details of the Bill. However, I urge him to bear in mind that, although this system of legislation is inadequate, it at least enables the House to debate railways projects. There is no such procedure for road projects, which is why we never debate them.

Mr. Bennett: I am not arguing for a procedure that would allow us to debate only road projects. I want a procedure that will enable us to debate our whole transport policy. We do not have an opportunity to debate a whole series of transport matters.

What is the relationship between the Bill's proposals and the whole question of the channel tunnel? I am mystified about what British Rail will do. Will it advertise to encourage people to go to Paris by taking the train from Paddington to Heathrow and then flying, or will it encourage people to go all the way by rail? The British Airports Authority wants to promote a rapid link to Heathrow because it wants to encourage more people to fly. I am baffled by British Rail's proposals.

We should have a proper debate about how far we want to encourage more people to fly to Europe or more people to travel by train when the channel tunnel is completed. We could debate the environmental issues and the implications for Kent and for those who live around the airport. The Bill also raises the whole question of the regional airports versus Heathrow. The north-west faced great difficulties about getting the money for a small rail link from the centre of Manchester to Manchester airport. That link should have been built years ago. However, we see the ease with which money can be raised to improve a link through the centre of London and out to Heathrow. We should be able to explore the whole of that argument.

We should question whether everyone should have to travel into London and then out to Heathrow or Gatwick rather than having direct links to those airports. Hon. Members have spoken about the west link. A west link would be attractive for people from the north of England because from Reading northwards the old Great Western line to Coventry would form an attractive link to the north-west. It is much more attractive to come from Manchester to Heathrow via Reading and to have a direct link into the airport from the west than to have to get out at Euston and struggle through central London and all its crowds.

Mr. Adley: That is precisely why I have been pleading for some years for the linking of the channel tunnel line and the proposed line through to Reading, Oxford, Banbury and, through Leamington, to Coventry. We have not touched on a matter that the promoters must consider because it is relevant to the Bill. It is whether passengers would prefer to save perhaps five minutes by transporting their own luggage from A to B or whether they would prefer through services if they were available. In any discussion on transport policy linking rail and air, that aspect of any proposal must be fully considered.

Mr. Bennett: I accept that. I would argue strongly for a link from Reading northwards. It would be attractive for people on the west side of Britain to have a major service down the west side to Reading which then made its way to the channel tunnel, avoiding London. A link from Reading to Heathrow would also be attractive. Many people who live north of Reading would find it better to go northwards to Manchester, which has a much more convenient airport, than to try to struggle round the four terminals at Heathrow. There are strong arguments for developing a policy that encourages much more use of regional airports.

A major problem of the private Bill procedure is that it does not give us a proper opportunity to explore what should be our national transport policy. For example, the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) asked whether people want through journeys, or to change. What about the convenience of changing on one platform rather than having to struggle from one platform to another—a factor with considerable implications for people with luggage?

If this were a public Bill, amendments could be tabled and issues could be debated at some length in Committee. I suspect that there would be a great deal of interest in debating and making proposals for an effective integrated public transport system. While the private Bill procedure gives us the occasional three-hour debate—when we press some of the procedural points, we get slightly more debates—it is not a satisfactory way in which to proceed.

There are also the environmental issues. The private Bill procedure is not satisfactory for those who live along the proposed routes. I appreciate that in this case the promoters have put much of the section to Heathrow underground, and removed the objections of some of the people who live close to the route and who would suffer environmental problems. However, those living along the existing sections of railway will suffer from the considerable increase in the frequency of trains. There are far better ways for them to put forward their objections than to have to come to a Private Bill Committee in the House of Commons.

It is increasingly onerous on hon. Members to have to sit in a semi-judicial role. Furthermore, I wonder whether any hon. Member can honestly say that he has no interest in a Bill such as this. The theory behind the Bill procedure is that four hon. Members, who are supposed to be neutral and disinterested, and who will listen to the case being put forward by the promoters and the objectors, are picked to serve on the Committees examining the Bills. I suspect that most hon. Members have suffered from the frustrations of trying to get out to Heathrow and would, for their own convenience, prefer to cut the journey time considerably. Many hon. Members use Heathrow almost weekly, so the House will have to look carefully to find those who could fairly serve on the Committee and have no interest in the matter. Furthermore, we do not best serve our constituents by being tied up in a Private Bill Committee with such narrow terms of reference for the long hours that some of our colleagues have suffered when dealing with private Bills such as the Kings Cross Railways Bill and the Channel Tunnel Bill and one or two other such Bills.

If the House were to refuse this and other carry-over motions, it would encourage the Government to reform the private Bill procedure. We have had a consultation document on this, and the responses to the Government were in by 28 September. I hope that the Minister will at least have a word with the Leader of the House and suggest that there are many attractions in finding time in the next Session to legislate to reform the private Bill procedure. It is likely that the Session after that will be the first of a new Parliament. I suspect that reform of private business would not be the first priority in such a Session. When the Labour party forms the new Government, there will be fierce competition for the first Bill, and I suspect that Tory Members who hope that they will form the next Government will not want legislation dealing with reform of private Bills to be introduced in the first Session of their new Parliament. Therefore, the next Session of Parliament, in which business appears to be rather light, gives us the most reasonable chance of getting through such reforms.

We must tell people outside what is happening. Several Bills dealing with transport are under discussion and people have a right to know whether such Bills will be taken through under the present archaic procedure, or under a new and improved set of rules. For example, in what way will the proposal for a cross-London link, which we have discussed today, be dealt with? We must sort out our procedures, and if the House stopped routinely passing carry-over motions and insisted that promoters got Bills through in one Session, or if the Government looked for some other way to promote such measures, that would be a major spur to sorting out these procedures.

8.35 pm

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I am the constituency Member for the Heathrow end of the proposed railway and I declare an interest as a shareholder in the British Airports Authority. My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson) said that the cost of amending the route was £25 million when, as I pointed out to him, it was £12 million which was put in by the BAA. The hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell)—I nearly called him my hon. Friend because we both sit on the Select Committee on Transport—also suffered from a slight misunderstanding. He said that his constituents were concerned about the rising of the line on the flyover, but the flyover comes out at Hayes. I think that the hon. Gentleman was remembering the days when he lived in this part of Hayes, and I hope that he does not mind my correcting what he said.

We have to look at several factors before deciding whether to agree to the carry-over motion. The first is consultation. When this issue first raised its head in the summer of 1988, what consultation there was was bad.

Since then, and since this was brought most forcibly to the attention of the sponsors by me and others, the consultation, especially that between the BAA and me, as the local Member of Parliament, has improved substantially. I am glad to place that on record.

I still believe that the route chosen is the wrong one. I feel that it should come in from Southall direct to the terminals. However, again as a result of the debates in the other place, the promoters of the Bill amended the proposal in a way that most reasonable people would feel is acceptable, and they are to be congratulated. However, many of my constituents are more concerned about the way in which the railway line will lift off past their homes —in some instances past their bedrooms—rather than being pleased that the line in going under the M4, as that has little effect on the way that they live or on their environment.

The amount involved now is over £200 million and, on the projected figures, 6 per cent. of the 39 million passengers using Heathrow will use the link. However, there will soon be a planning application for terminal 5, which, if approved, will increase the number of passengers to 50 million. What will be the effect on the comfort and perhaps even the safety of the link of another 1 million passengers—7 million rather than 6 million? Before we decide to agree to the carry-over motion, will my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest say how this potential increase in rail use is covered by the Bill?

I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) that we must have a better rail link from London to Heathrow. The motorway and other surface access to Heathrow is appalling with four terminals, and the only way to improve surface access is to make sure not just that we have a link but that we have one that meets the needs of my constituents as well as the financial aspirations of British Rail and BAA.

My local authority of Hillingdon has never been and is not now opposed to the principle of a fast rail link. However, some questions need to be answered. As I have already said, the construction will cause a great deal of concern to my constituents. The area is renowned for the amount of hazardous waste beneath the surface. Unfortunately, it has methane gas deposits, so great care must be taken. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will give an assurance that all possible measures will be taken to minimise the impact of dealing with hazardous infill—for example, it may have to be moved and deep piling may be necessary.

Although the proposals are welcome to many people in my area, it must be remembered that my constituents will have to cope with the noise of additional trains at night and early in the morning. I wonder whether the Bill's promoters have considered every possibility for minimising the noise from additional trains.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: I have already said that 15 petitions have been lodged against the Bill, some of which relate to my hon. Friend's concerns. If the carry-over motion is passed, that will provide an opportunity for the important points raised by my hon. Friend to be given an appropriate airing in Committee.

Mr. Dicks: I am aware of the requirement that we speak within the rules of the carry-over motion. However, if my hon. Friend can clarify certain aspects of the proposal tonight, some of the petitioners might modify their objections by the time the Bill reaches Committee.

I understand the comments from south Wales Members about trains not stopping to pick up passengers along the line into London, even though Heathrow is just around the corner from some of the stations.

I am in a dilemma, because some of my constituents do not want the rail link, while my local authority wants it, but believes that there is a better route. At this stage, I am not sure which way I shall vote. From a democratic viewpoint, I suppose that a Second Reading would give hon. Members the opportunity to air their views in a much deeper and more meaningful way than is possible on a narrow carry-over motion. Perhaps, on balance, there is a case for allowing the Bill to proceed to Second Reading. I shall have to make a decision on that before the vote.

8.42 pm

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Like other hon. Members, I am in a dilemma. I am not opposed to the principle of a fast rail link from London to Britain's major airport. London has been referred to as the nation's capital, and it is certainly one of the nation's capitals. I am disinclined to support the motion, and my reasons for that are related to what a carry-over motion is all about and to the rights of ordinary Members of Parliament with an interest in the matter. I have taken an interest in this Bill since it was first mooted and eventually made its first tentative steps into the private Bill procedure in another place.

We must seriously consider our rights in relation both to the private Bill procedure and to carry-over motions. Most of us understand the private Bill procedure to confer on Members of Parliament the right to express views to the promoters. The promoters then have a fairly clear idea what they need to do to satisfy the objections from all parts of the House. If they want their Bill to go through quickly, they try to meet those objections. If they do not mind struggling through a carry-over motion, Second Reading in the next Session and a Committee stage opposed by 25 petitioners, the procedure will take a great deal longer but they may eventually get the Bill in the form in which it was originally tabled. That is their choice, and it is the traditional way in which we conduct our private Bill procedure. It is the balance that Parliament has struck between the rights of the promoters to bring a private Bill before Parliament, with petitioners able to object to it, and our rights as Back-Bench Members of Parliament.

I listened carefully to what the hon. Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson) said when he attempted to satisfy some of the objections from Opposition Members and, in particular, from Conservative Members, in the hope that those who are minded to vote against the Bill or who are extremely worried about it might have their minds changed by the end of the debate. I wish to explore the exact nature of the assurances that he gave to his hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) and others. I wish to clarify exactly what he said.

I should not like to think that the hon. Gentleman was giving oral promises which might fall into the Sam Goldwyn category of not being worth the paper on which they are written. The hon. Gentleman said that the promoters were fairly open-minded about making some provision for travel from the west into Heathrow which would take advantage of the investment that the British Airports Authority and British Rail are willing to make. He said that he wanted to make that point at this stage in the hope of achieving some cross-party—east and west of Heathrow—backing.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: I made it clear that the Bill seeks to provide a basic, dedicated service between the capital and Heathrow. However, the promoters have said that at some time in the future, after that is set in place, they will consider the options available—some of which were referred to by my hon. Friend the Minister—when the east-west crosslink has been built. Much is said about what happens in continental Europe. Charles de Gaulle airport has a dedicated line which does not go past the airport, and does not pick up people from Reims, Vervins or anywhere else. That is a normal procedure. British Rail is right to build a basic system first and then consider the options to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Morgan: If I understand the hon. Gentleman correctly, he is withdrawing all the assurances that he gave about having an understanding with the sponsors that, if we pass the carry-over motion and give the Bill a Second Reading, at some stage in the proceedings the sponsors will be willing to spend some money on making provision for westward travel. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that, if we pass the carry-over motion and if the sponsors manage successfully to negotiate the other shoals and rapids of the parliamentary procedure, perhaps at some later stage there could be some provision for futher expenditure, wholly unconnected with the matter before us tonight, which might provide the wider link to south Wales and, as mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), to Birmingham and points north-west via a link from Didcot? The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: I am not trying to have it both ways. If the hon. Gentleman reads what I said in Hansard he will find that, both in my opening remarks and now, I am saying that we are seeking power in the Bill to build a basic link between the two points. However, British Rail has said that in future it will look at the sort of extensions to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

As the former Chairman of the Joint Select Committee on Private Bill Procedure, I am well aware of the current system's defects. The Committee's unanimous report is currently being considered by both parts of the House. As the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) pointed out, that led to a consultation document which ended on 28 September. There is nothing sacrosanct about the private Bill procedure. I should like to see it altered for railway building, but I am anxious that the Bill should go forward for a Second Reading when the important points to which the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) has referred can be properly discussed. He can have the proper assurances on such an occasion, but I am afraid that tonight is not the right occasion for such assurances to be given.

Mr. Morgan: It is important that the House should be crystal clear about what the hon. Gentleman is now saying. Is he saying that the Bill's promoters are open-minded about amending it during its passage through the House with regard to both the Westminster end and the people who represent constituencies immediately west of Heathrow or around Heathrow or elsewhere? Or are they merely open-minded about doing something entirely different at a later stage? Of course they will be open-minded about introducing an entirely different Bill at an entirely different time, possibly with an entirely different public/private sector joint venture. But I think that the hon. Gentleman is saying that their minds are closed to any alterations to the Bill.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: I made the point earlier that in the Opposed Private Bill Committee in the other place a substantial change was made to the route that the link will take. It was to have gone on a viaduct above the M4, but it is now going in a tunnel under it. The hon. Gentleman's point can be argued in Committee, if such takes place, when the Bill returns in the next Session. The assurances for which he is asking must be given by the promoters. I am making the point that they are listening to what he is saying and that the purpose of the Bill, as at present drafted, is to build the basic link.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful for the gracious way in which the hon. Gentleman has risen every time I have challenged him. I do not wish to put too heavy a burden on him as though he were the promoter—he has simply introduced the Bill today for the purposes of the carry-over motion—but it is our right as Members of Parliament on a carry-over motion that is important.

The hon. Gentleman said that in the other place the promoters showed themselves flexible enough to put more of the line in a tunnel and therefore we should be reasonably satisfied that they will listen to any points that are made, but this carry-over motion is one of the ways in which to bring a bit of heavy muscle to bear on the promoters so that they give us some indication of the kind that they have not shown so far during the Commons stages of the Bill. They have done so in respect of altering the route from Paddington to Heathrow, but not in respect of the linkages between the line and the rest of the public railway system. That is the critical point. Are they willing to consider putting one or more stops on the line, as distinct from altering the route or putting sections of it in a tunnel? That is the sort of thing that Back Benchers would like to know at this stage.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this a procedural motion. The hon. Gentleman is anticipating a Second Reading debate, when these matters can be debated.

Mr. Rowlands: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. After an earlier exchange between myself and the hon. Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson), I believed that this was an open-minded debate and that when it came to Second Reading and subsequent stages the promoters would be genuinely open-minded and at least consider making provision in the Bill for stopovers and connections with the west, particularly with south Wales. It now appears that that is not quite so, and that affects the way in which I shall vote on the motion. Therefore, I hope that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will consider that a legitimate point to raise in the debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for me. The hon. Gentleman seems to be repeating a speech that he made earlier.

Mr. Morgan: I am confining myself as best I can to the motion, but in my inexperience you, Madam Deputy Speaker, may have to correct me and I shall be happy to accept such a correction.

I am concerned about the kind of undertaking that can be given in a debate on a carry-over motion to show not the good behaviour of the promoters but their flexibility, which the sponsor has been at pains to emphasise in his opening speech and in his interventions in response to me and to other hon. Members.

There are three major ways, apart from the buffers at Paddington station, of linking the dedicated enclave line contained in this private Bill with the public railway system. Can some sort of nod or wink be given at this stage as to whether any of those are up for grabs if we agree to the carry-over motion and the Bill reaches Second Reading and Committee stage? Those three ways have been partly referred to by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape).

Mr. Adley: I accept the assurance given by my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson) and I gratefully accept the Minister's offer of a meeting to ensure proper ministerial influence. I hope that on that basis the hon. Gentleman will be inclined to join me in the Lobby tonight in support of the motion.

Mr. Morgan: I shall be happy to do that. Earlier today the Welsh parliamentary group met the Minister in Marsham street when the matter that we are discussing was touched on. Like the hon. Gentleman, I accept the assurances that have been given, but I want to know what they mean. Basically, we are seeking to discover what a carry-over motion can achieve for ordinary hon. Members.

I was dealing with the three major ways of linking the line to the public railway system and whether we can discuss those tonight by way of a sponsor's undertaking on behalf of the promoters or whether we simply have to accept an open-ended assurance that they may be dealt with at another time.

We in south Wales would like a stop on the line as far west as possible—somewhere between West Drayton and Hayes, I think, but my knowledge of the local geography is limited. Members for the Ealing area have already mentioned that they would like a more commuter-oriented stop closer into London—seven miles east of Farringdon. We would like some mention of that from the sponsor tonight. If we give the Bill's supporters the carry-over motion tonight, are they prepared at a later stage to talk about stops, or have they completely shut that out of their minds? Would they rather drop the whole Bill? Do they think that stops would wreck the economics of the line?

Another idea has been mentioned three or four times today, so I am sure that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will not mind if I mention it a fifth or sixth time. That is the question of a westward-pointing junction just slightly west of Heathrow, which would join up on the stub line down into Heathrow with the eastward-facing junction coming out in the Hayes area. They would join up to enable people from Slough and points west as far as Reading, Bristol, south Wales—and, indeed, Oxford and Birmingham—to enter London from that route.

A third idea is what I think that the sponsor has talked about. It has also been tangentially referred to by the local Member of Parliament, the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), with whom I had the honour of serving on the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill for some sins that I must have committed during the summer of 1987, although I have still not found out what they were. They pointed out that if, and only if, terminal 5 is built at Heathrow—and that would convert this matter into a totally different type of undertaking—a westward link would come out underneath terminal 5 of the new railway link that is to go underneath terminals 1, 2, 3 and 4, thereby offering a nice little carrot to the House of Commons to remember in future what we spoke about in the original Heathrow Express Railway Bill back in the summer of 1990. It is almost as if they are saying, "We are willing to do that for you now, but only if you give us permission for terminal 5." That would not convert tonight's proceedings into an ability to obtain an undertaking that they are willing to consider a westward link; it would mean that, if they come back with an entirely different scheme to expand Heathrow massively to a capacity for a throughput of up to 60 million or 70 million passengers a year, as was mentioned by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington——

Mr. Dicks: I did mention 50 million, but the 60 million or 70 million referred to by the hon. Gentleman is going too far. Nor was I suggesting that the promoters—especially British Airways—would use this as a form of blackmail to get terminal 5; I was merely referring to the transport implications for both road and rail of a fifth terminal.

Mr. Morgan: I mentioned 60 million or 70 million, as opposed to the 50 million mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, because I am not the local Member of Parliament and therefore would not encounter the frightful constituency implications that no doubt would affect him. I am not merely repeating the hon. Gentleman's point about terminal 5; I am amplifying it, because it is entirely relevant to the carry-over motion.

I have been exercising my rights as an ordinary Member of Parliament to object to a private Bill. I have put my name down; other objectors have had to withdraw because they are now on the Government Front Bench. I have done that for many months. The objectors have had meetings with the two promoters of the Bill. The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington has exercised his right, as a local Member of Parliament, and I have exercised mine as a south Wales Member of Parliament. The promoters have told us that if there is a fifth terminal it will be possible to exercise the third way of connecting up to the railway system somewhere west of Slough. A big loop would then come in from Reading, dive down to terminal 5 and through to terminals 4, 3, 2 and 1, and back up on the line that we are discussing tonight.

What is being said is, "Give us the ham tonight, and then, if you give us the eggs at a later stage, we will have a 'ham and eggs' of the westward link." That is what hon. Members on both sides of the House are asking for tonight —both those who want commuter assistance because they represent constituencies near Heathrow involving huge work forces, and others who have a regional point of view to put but cannot put it properly under the private Bill procedure unless they exercise their muscle power as Back Benchers in relation to carry-over motions.

Procedural though they be, such motions give us the right to try to put the squeeze on the promoters of private Bills. Otherwise they ignore us completely, as we have been ignored regionally in attempting to exercise our rights. That is why tonight's procedural motion provides an extremely welcome opportunity for us to see whether, by expressing our views forcefully tonight, we can obtain some type of undertaking that the promoters are listening to people who say that "private enclave" railways are not a good investment for this country, but that new investment on the railways that is linked to the public railway system is a good investment for many reasons relating to the environment, global warming, traffic exhaust fumes and surface access transport to the most important single mode of transport in this country.

I am still disinclined to vote for the carry-over motion, simply because of the procedural point that has already been referred to by the hon. Member for New Forest—when he was talking as the past joint Chairman of the Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure and not as a sponsor of the Bill. That Committee made a recommendation that carry-over motions should not be acceded to by the House unless the promoters could demonstrate that they had not been dilatory. I think that I am summarising the views about the dilatory clause in the recommendations. In the narrow procedural context, we must ask ourselves whether the promoters have been dilatory and whether they have dealt properly with the objectors who have made their views known.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: The promoters have been extremely attentive in dealing with the objections put to them—some would argue that in the other place a great measure of success was achieved by the objectors. Tonight, we are asking only that the Bill be given an opportunity to progress in the next Session, so that the promoters can be equally thoughtful and forthcoming in response to views of the kind that the hon. Gentleman is expressing.

If the motion is lost, the link will be lost. Those who would vote it down must understand that it will be a long time before such a project can be re-established. Who knows when? I urge those who have doubts to allow the Bill to proceed in the next Session, so that all the valid arguments deployed today by the hon. Gentleman and others can be fully considered. To kill the motion now will be effectively to kill the Bill, with great damage to those who need the link to London airport.

Mr. Morgan: That was a very effective winding-up speech by way of an intervention. In accepting the point that I made when quoting the hon. Gentleman's report, as Chairman of the Committee, that carry-over motions should not be available to promoters unless they can prove that they have not been dilatory, I presume that the hon. Gentleman accepts also that that ruling does not apply to any proceedings in another place, but only to the extent that the promoters have been dilatory after a Bill has left the Lords and it comes before this House. Our only concern is whether Members of this House and their objections have been dealt with in a reasonable manner. I am not suggesting that our arguments should immediately be conceded—that would be nonsense—but have the promoters made any attempt to meet the many points that have been made?

The promoters know, for example, that all Members of Parliament representing constituencies in south Wales have fears about the future of Paddington station, and believe that the people of south Wales are again being treated like second-class citizens. If rail congestion in the Paddington area gets much worse during the construction of the link, we may be compelled to have Welsh parliamentary questions in Reading town hall because that will be the only place where we can foregather.

Our fears are reinforced when we hear that not only the 10 miles on our main line—although we have no ministerial access to it—is to be electrified, but that something more is to happen, according to the statement made by the Secretary of State for Transport at last week's Tory conference in Bournemouth. The Secretary of State appears to believe that announcements about major new investment projects are in the nature of a travel competition, in which the first prize is a week's holiday in Bournemouth and the second prize a week's holiday in Bournemouth, spent in deafening silence at that conference.

The Secretary of State makes such announcements thinking that everyone will be very pleased. That new project has not yet come before this House, which is a sad reflection on the right of Members of Parliament to debate such matters. In any event, we understand that the line is now to be electrified as far as Reading. However, places to the north of Reading and elsewhere, where the rest of us live—such as Didcot, Oxford, Birmingham and even Scotland, where access could be provided via the west coast main line, though the Scots may have views about the desirability of using Heathrow anyway—are treated as back numbers. They are expected to find ways of compensating for that disadvantage through regional policy, simply because investment decisions are oriented entirely to south-east England.

No wonder we often have to debate regional policy, when private Bills and carry-over motions pass through this House as though they have no regional or wider implications, and when the only point considered to be of importance is whether objectors to the land being taken, and so on, can be squared when the Bill reaches the Committee.

The debate tonight is important because of its wider implications for electrification and the links between the proposed railway and the present public rail system.

The private Bill procedure has many problems.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): One argument that my hon. Friend may like to consider in support of the carry-over motion is that it will allow us the opportunity to study the fare structure used on the link as well as that used elsewhere by British Rail. My hon. Friend is familiar with many aspects of European life. A few days ago, I travelled between Paris and Brest on a superb train, part of the way it was the TGV, and the fare was two-thirds what it would be here. My hon. Friend will be aware that French railway investment is proceeding apace. I welcome the proposed investment in the Bill, but I hope that it will not be accompanied by a fares policy which is outrageously at variance with the policy across the channel.

Mr. Morgan: The financing of the line should be fully considered at Second Reading, if the Bill gets that far. The use of the private Bill procedure by a consortium which is both private and public has financial implications. British Airports Authority was privatised recently but the money that it will use to fund the express line comes from taxes forgone on duty-free goods at Heathrow. British Airports Authority have a tax-free concession from all of us here tonight and from the 60 million people who live in this country. As people do not pay tax on the goods that they buy there, we all have to pay more tax. The British Airports Authority sells franchises for sale of duty-free goods, for example, to Hills duty-free shops which put 50 per cent. of the price back on to the duty-free goods. Payment for such franchises are made to the British Airports Authority which then has free capital to invest in projects such as the one we are discussing tonight. However, we shall not be able to discuss the financing of the link tonight, as the money used has been called private money. It is not private, it is our money—the taxpayer's money—because it is a result of taxes forgone on goods: VAT, purchase tax and other taxes on goods sold——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is going a long way off the rails from the carry-over motion. He is an experienced parliamentarian and debater and I am well aware of that, but I should like him to return to the motion on the Order Paper now.

Mr. Morgan: I do not want to cross swords with you, Madam Deputy Speaker. Even before I became a Member of Parliament I was warned not to do so. I was told that you had been a Tiller girl and the emphasis was on the Attila. Therefore, I shall definitely not quarrel with you tonight.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): My hon. Friend mentioned Scotland. Everyone in Scotland to whom I have spoken about the link is in favour of it. All those people who travel from Inverness, Edinburgh and Glasgow to Heathrow hate the dreadful journey from Heathrow into central London on the Piccadilly line. However, they have serious reservations about diverting money from the Glasgow to Euston run for the construction of the express link. I have met no one in Scotland who objects to the express link—they support it wholeheartedly.

Mr. Morgan: I entirely agree that there is universal support for the line but people want it to be linked to the rail system. They are surprised at the dilatoriness with which the promoters of the Bill have considered how to join the express link with the present railway system.

I am still inclined to oppose the carry-over motion. The sponsor's threats that successful opposition to the carry-over motion would kill the chance of getting a link from central London——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does my hon. Friend accept that if the Bill falls today it will put considerable pressure on the Government to sort out the private Bill procedure and they could consider bringing forward their own legislation? The promoters would be able to reintroduce the Bill in November and, provided that they had been able to satisfy all the petitioners, the Bill would go through the House as an unopposed private Bill. Such Bills can move through both Houses extremely quickly. That is one of the arguments for getting petitions sorted out before the promoter starts the parliamentary procedure. Therefore, that threat is not serious and if the promoters were willing to meet the wishes of the objectors, a Bill could go through Parliament quickly.

Mr. Morgan: I was about to make that point to the sponsor of the Bill. I am sure that he did not mean to threaten the House when he said that if the House exercised its constitutional right to refuse the carry-over motion because it believed that the promoters had been dilatory, that would be the end of the Heathrow Express Railway Bill. That is what I think that he said, but I am sure that he did not mean it. If it were a threat, it would be accepted in the way that all threats are accepted. It would show that the promoters had adopted a poor attitude and that they were prepared to cut off their nose to spite their face.

The House has to consider whether to exercise its right to refuse the carry-over motion. It would be open to the promoters to reintroduce the Bill in the next Session. Similarly, recommittal occasionally takes place because of changed circumstances. If the House refuses to agree to the carry-over motion, that will not be the end of the story. The promoters believe that the Bill is a gold mine, so they will reintroduce it in the next Session of Parliament. We want to be part of that gold mine; we do not want to be second-class citizens. Between 6 million and 7 million people live in the London area; they need a first-class service. In addition, between 6 million and 7 million people live to the west of Heathrow. They, too, want a first-class service to Heathrow, but they do not want to lose the almost first-class service to Paddington that they now enjoy. For that reason, I intend to oppose the carry-over motion.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Promoters of the Heathrow Express Railway Bill [Lords] shall have leave to suspend proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bill, if they think fit, in the next Session of Parliament, provided that the Agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office of their intention to suspend further proceedings not later than the day before the close of the present Session and that all Fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid;

That if the Bill is brought from the Lords in the next Session, the Agents for the Bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration signed by them stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill which was brought from the Lords in the present Session;

That as soon as a certificate by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office, that such a declaration has been so deposited, has been laid upon the Table of the House, the Bill shall be deemed to have been read the first and shall be ordered to be read a second time;

That the Petitions against the Bill presented in the present Session which stand referred to the Committee on the Bill shall stand referred to the Committee on the Bill in the next Session;

That no Petitioners shall be heard before the Committee on the Bill, unless their Petition has been presented within the time limited within the present Session or deposited pursuant to paragraph (b) of Standing Order 126 relating to Private Business;

That in relation to the Bill, Standing Order 127 relating to Private Business shall have effect as if the words "under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of petitions against Bill)" were omitted;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.

Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill [Lords]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the promoters of the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill [Lords] shall have leave to suspend proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bill, if they think fit, in the next Session of Parliament, provided that the Agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office of their intention to suspend further proceedings not later than the day before the close of the present Session and that all Fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid;

That, if the Bill is brought from the Lords in the next Session, the Agents for the Bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration signed by them, stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill which was brought from the Lords in the present Session;

That as soon as a certificate by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office, that such a declaration has been so deposited, has been laid upon the Table of the House, the Bill shall be read the first and second time and committed (and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read and committed) and shall be committed to the Chairman of Ways and Means, who shall make such Amendments thereto as have been made by the Committee in the present Session, and shall report the Bill as amended in the House forthwith, and the Bill, so amended, shall be ordered to lie upon the Table;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.—[The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

9.28 pm

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I shall be brief in asking the House to agree to the carry-over motion, but, with the leave of the House, I shall be happy to respond to points made in the debate if that is helpful.

Mine is a simple plea: do not dash the hopes of my constituents for a better future, for a better environment and for homes and jobs by voting against a motion that simply allows for full debate in the new Session. I hope that even opponents of the Bill will support the carry-over motion and welcome, as I do, the prospect of proper and full debate on Report.

I have been asking myself whether there are any reasons of any weight for refusing a carry-over. Frankly, there are not. There are, of course, important issues for us to debate on Report, and I shall refer briefly to two. First, there has been a great deal of argument about groundwater. There has also been a great deal of avoidable confusion and some disinformation, but groundwater is undoubtedly a matter of concern. I took the matter seriously from the beginning. When I found that the arguments were becoming technical and esoteric, I demanded the right to appoint my own independent expert to review all the evidence progressively, in order not to have to choose between the corporate view of the development corporation and its advisers on the one hand and the committed opponents of the Bill on the other. These matters will be debated further on Report, but let me give a succinct summary of the position today.

I remind hon. Members that impoundment is not to a level greater than the current position. The level of impounded water will be between the present high water level and the present low water level. I would certainly not support the building of the barrage if the evidence suggested that my constituents were under serious threat. If serious doubts about safety were to arise now or in the future, I should cease to support the Bill—so would South Glamorgan county council, Cardiff city council and others involved in the promotion of the Bill. But that is certainly not the case to date.

There is a continuing debate about detail, but that must not be allowed to obscure the fact that all available evidence continues to provide a reassurance that the original conclusions remain valid, that, combined with generous safety margins, they provide the basis for confidence in the future and that the selection of plus-4 to 4·5 m ordnance datum for the impounded level is reasonable and sensible. Details will rightly be the subject of debate on Report and of public debate when the additional studies are completed, but there are no grounds for general doubt which would justify refusing further consideration of the Bill.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Is my hon. Friend saying that at this stage, in discussing safety, he takes no account of the urban swamp hypothesis which was put forward by Dr. John Miles in Committee and which it appears the Select Committee accepted?

Mr. Michael: I am aware of the evidence provided by Dr. John Miles and others and I have taken account of it. The conclusions which have been reached and which are supported by the evidence to date and the generous safety margins provide the basis for confidence in the future. The selection of plus-4 m to 4·5 m OD for the impounded level is reasonable and sensible. I have taken account of the evidence given to the Committee. I have taken independent advice and I state that with confidence. Were the position to change, it would be a different matter, but that is the position now.

The second major issue that has been debated, and which is of considerable interest to some of my colleagues, is wildlife. I can understand their concern, taken in the context of a general threat to estuaries, but, as I have pointed out frequently to colleagues and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, they are attacking the wrong case in opposing developments in Cardiff, because here their case is weak. However, that, too, can be debated on Report. We can also talk then about the artificial lagoon which is a major and significant attempt to reconcile development with conservation—indeed, it is a landmark in attempting to do so.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): My hon. Friend said that the case of those who are concerned about conservation is weak. Surely he has read the examination in the Committee of the witnesses brought by the promoters of the Bill and the petitioners against it. There was general agreement that there would be considerable destruction of wildlife in the bay area and that we would be in breach of our obligations to protect a site of special scientific interest which is protected under the Ramsar convention and which is entitled to protection under the European directive on wild birds. There was consensus in the Committee. How can my hon. Friend say that the case is weak?

Mr. Michael: I know of my hon. Friend's great interest in these matters but, with respect, I think that he stretches the evidence given in Committee and the strength of the case made by the RSPB and those interested in wildlife. A number of issues need to be discussed, but, as I was about to say, I maintain that there are significant positive aspects in the attempts that are being made to reconcile development and conservation and that the barrage will bring positive effects in encouraging wildlife and a living environment in Cardiff bay. It will be appropriate for us to discuss those aspects on Report and when we have the conclusions of the Select Committee before us. Those two questions have been debated in the past, and I submit that in no sense are they matters on which to base opposition to the carry-over motion, which is the only motion before the House tonight.

The Bill's opponents have advanced further arguments. They say that they do not like the private Bill procedure. I agree. It is an antiquated procedure which requires amendment. The procedure has been diabolically unfair to the promoters, to me and to my constituents, so I share the concern about it.

People have said that they do not like development corporations. By and large, I agree with them, but in this case the development corporation is working in partnership with local elected representatives.

Other issues, such as the removal of the tip in my constituency, have been brought into the debate and a proposal to provide two new schools for the most deprived area in Cardiff even came under threat recently. I submit, however, that none of these matters provides any ground whatever for the refusal of the carry-over motion.

The supporters of the Bill are also involved with a number of other important issues, such as how to preserve existing jobs, how to bring good-quality new jobs to the area, how to provide affordable housing and housing for rent and how to balance the existing communities with the new communities that are to be created.

I remind the House that the whole development area is in my constituency and that, while groundwater may affect constituencies other than mine and new jobs will help other constituencies, most of the matters that I have listed affect my constituency and my constituency alone. However, for the purposes of tonight's debate, the important thing to remember is that they are not relevant to the Bill. Even if one has persuaded oneself that they are relevant to the Bill, one must nevertheless accept that they do not represent the slightest ground for rejecting the carry-over motion. I hope that even the Bill's opponents will accept that and will not indulge in spoiling tactics.

So far I have concentrated on the defensive arguments but there are many positive arguments in favour of the Bill. The hon. Member for Cardiff North (Mr. Jones) and I have sought to provide as much information as possible to hon. Members about the Bill's positive benefits, and I shall not take the time of the House by expanding on that information. The arguments against it can be fully explored on Report and we should set aside those issues which do not, in any way, justify a refusal of the carry-over motion. The positive arguments are far more important. The Bill will make possible the creation of a quality waterside environment. That potential has been proved by the development that has already taken place at Bute east dock, where we see fishermen and cormorants and where there is Dragon boat racing at the weekend. Local people make use of the place. They talk there and enjoy the environment. The same water quality will pertain in Cardiff bay once we have impoundment.

I was involved in the economic development of Cardiff for 16 years as a councillor before I came to this place. I was involved in the redevelopment of the central area of Cardiff, which is now acknowledged throughout the world to have been a success. I have been involved in trying to help small firms and businesses. The present development of south Cardiff and the bay area—the fact that people are coming into that area—is built on faith in the Bill's success and on the record of success that we have achieved in recent years.

This is my first opportunity to place a certain matter on record, albeit that it involves a slight diversion from the motion. In the latter part of the Committee stage, we heard comments about the Labour councillors who supported the development of south Cardiff and the barrage and, in particular, the three who were elected by ballot of their peers to be members of the Cardiff Bay development corporation board. I refer to the leader of South Glamorgan county council, Councillor Lord Brooks, to Councillor Paddy Kitson, who represents the most deprived area of the city, and to the late Councillor John Reynolds, the then leader of Cardiff city council. Between them, they provided more than 100 years' service to the city and the Labour movement of the area. I am sure that the remarks about a master-servant relationship to the board came from ignorance rather than malice, but it is sad that those remarks were made when Councillor John Reynolds had unfortunately passed away.

John Reynolds was a kind and gentle man; a lion in defence of the defenceless and when fighting for the future of the city that he loved and in the service of which he destroyed his own health. He had the toughness of a true friend, the courage to withstand and forgive the pettiness of others and, above all, an absolute integrity which made him a giant in the Labour movement of Cardiff in a way in which the author of the minority report clearly did not understand or appreciate. I ask the House to understand the way in which the Bill was supported by John Reynolds and the others who represent their fellow councillors on the board and the fact that the Bill has not commanded uncritical support from the late Councillor John Reynolds, myself, or the councillors of the city and county who represent the area. It has commanded the critical, careful and genuine support of elected representatives who are determined to do their best to achieve a real future for their constituents.

Therefore, I return to my basic and simple plea to the House—do not dash the hopes of my constituents for a better future, a better environment, for homes and for jobs by voting down the Bill on a motion which, I remind the House, simply allows the Bill to be carried forward for a full debate on Report in the new Session when any hon. Member can have an opportunity fully to discuss the issues raised in this important Bill.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) that we all have that opportunity now, which is why some of us are choosing to exercise our right to object to the carry-over motion. We are objecting in principle to the Bill. It has already been examined by the House and our questions have not been answered. We know that it has been considered in Committee where many of its fundamental flaws were exposed. We feel that it is now time for the Bill to be stopped and to proceed no further. That is why we shall oppose it.

I was surprised that my hon. Friend used the term "spoiling tactics" to describe our opposition to the Bill——

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend should not be surprised.

Mr. Davies: Apparently my hon. Friend wants to intervene and I am happy for him to do so. If he reserves for himself the right to promote the Bill in the House, he must recognise that others of us have the right to oppose the Bill. If he is suggesting that the House should approve a carry-over motion, he must recognise that others are equally entitled to oppose that. He is not doing his case any good to describe our principled and fundamental oppposition to the Bill as "spoiling tactics". We have made our root and branch opposition to the Bill clear throughout.

I should like to put on the record the fact that if we are unsuccessful in halting the Bill's progress tonight, it will not be the end of the matter. The Bill will return for its consideration motion and we shall oppose it again. We shall then table many many amendments. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth will have to detain the House night after night and he will find that the coalition that has been constructed to get the Bill this far will come increasingly under pressure.

Many of us knew Councillor John Reynolds and, regardless of our views on the Bill and on the way in which he voted in his role as a representative in Cardiff, all of us deeply mourn his passing and associate ourselves entirely with my hon. Friend's comments. There is no dispute between us on that.

I have referred to the coalition that is supporting the Bill. It is as well to clear up this matter now because the carry-over motion will not be determined only by the dozen or so hon. Members who are present now, although those of us who are present shall listen to the debate and consider the options and the consequences and the future of the Bill. But when it comes, the vote will not be cast by people in favour of the Bill. It will be cast by the coalition that I have mentioned, consisting in part of Tory Members who will ensure that the Government's will prevails. The payroll vote is on call tonight. A moment ago the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was here; he has absolutely no interest in Wales, Cardiff or the barrage——

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Or in agriculture.

Mr. Davies: I was coming to that—to judge by his speeches it is true.

We know that the payroll vote has been put on standby and will be wheeled out to try to obtain a majority.

The coalition also consists of Parliamentary Private Secretaries. I see the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) in his place—

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): I am the hon. Gentleman's Member of Parliament.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman is not my Member of Parliament. He represents the constituency in which I temporarily reside. He will be pleased to know that I put up a poster in the window at every election urging my neighbours to put him out of a job. As it seems that he will play a crucial role in tonight's proceedings, I can assure him that I will put up two posters at the next election urging my neighbours to put him out of a job.

Mr. Morgan: As further evidence of the extent to which the Government are committing their prestige to this apparently private Bill, the White Paper on the environment published by the Government less than a month ago states, in the section on Wales, that "the Cardiff Bay Development Corporation was established in 1987 to secure the physical, social and economic regeneration of the South Cardiff area, including the former docklands."

That is a bipartisan statement which presents no problem to any of us. The document continues:

"The aim is to introduce new housing, employment and a better environment to the area".

We have no quarrel with that either. It goes on:

"The strategy includes a proposal to construct a barrage across the estuary of the Taff and Ely as a key feature".

We have no doubt that the Government support what should be considered a private Bill on which they should be neutral.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend is exactly right, as he invariably is in these matters. That is why the Whips Office and the Parliamentary Private Secretaries are conniving at producing an artificial majority to ensure the Bill's progress.

Another element in the coalition is represented by the hon. Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander), who I know takes a keen interest in environmental matters. But I also know that he has been on what we call a freebie. I am sure that he will correct me if I am wrong—I do not want to cast aspersions that I cannot justify—but I believe that he has been entertained at public expense down in Cardiff, where he was persuaded, no doubt, by the force of the arguments that he heard. I am sure that the five-course arguments and the brandy and cigars did not influence him at all. The fact is that he and many other Members have been entertained at public expense and we shall see tonight when the voting lists are prepared that those Members have stayed behind to cast their votes.

If this happened in local government, and people were influenced in any way when casting their votes, they would be prosecuted. All Conservative Members were party to the legislation that placed obligations on local councillors to declare their interests so as to ensure that their votes are not influenced by financial considerations, and to exclude themselves voluntarily from those considerations. That is a fairly seedy coalition.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth pleaded with us not to dash the hopes of his constituents for a better future and a better environment. Unfortunately, no one knows whether he is speaking on behalf of the majority of his constituents, because that has not been tested.

Mr. Michael: It is generally accepted in the House that hon. Members know their own constituents. I am quite confident about the matter and it has been tested at the ballot box because anti-barrage candidates stood in recent elections and were thoroughly trounced. I spend a good deal of time in my constituency and I have the pulse of the opinion there. My hon. Friend might bear in mind, as he considers the views of those who are more and more remote from the area that will be directly affected by the Bill, that it has the support of four of the five Members in the south Glamorgan area.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend asserts that his case is correct, but he has not introduced any evidence to substantiate it. I am not persuaded by such assertions. He spoke about anti-barrage candidates who have been beaten by Labour candidates. He is not so naive as to think that in local elections people vote on single issues. The fact that more than 400 people were prepared to vote for anti-barrage candidates is significant. I am debating on my hon. Friend's ground and it is not an area that I want to enter. However, I know that many Labour party members in his constituency have considerable doubts about the measure. Of course, at election time they will vote Labour because that is their primary commitment and loyalty. We would not expect them to vote anything other than Labour. I urge anti-barrage candidates not to stand.

Mr. Morgan: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davies: I should like to develop my argument a little further before giving way.

We do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth speaks for all his constituents. However, we do know that a considerable body of opinion is opposed to this measure. Some people oppose it for reasons related to the environment. I am in that category. Some are opposed to it because they think that their homes are jeopardised, and some feel that such public expenditure cannot be justified. My hon. Friend should recognise that an influential organisation in Cardiff is opposed to the measure. I think that all hon. Members have received a submission from an organisation called Cardiff Residents Against the Barrage. The residents ask, "Can it be defended?"

Mr. Michael: Not all of them say that.

Mr. Davies: If my hon. Friend feels in any way slighted by his constituents, with whom he apparently enjoys such a close relationship, I shall remedy that because as soon as I have concluded this point I shall pass the leaflet to him. For the sake of other hon. Members who might not have received it, I shall read it. It states:

"Can it be defended if a parliamentary private Bill has to be carried over into a third Session?"

That is almost unprecedented and we know that the proceduralists in the House have produced reports expressing great concern at a single carry-over motion. However, we are now talking about a second carry-over motion and the Bill having to go into a third Session of Parliament. The Bill has been considerably damaged and we shall have to wait for action by a Minister if it proceeds. The residents say:

"Can the Bill be defended if the Commons Select Committee was unconvinced by the promoters' technical case to the extent that the final decision has been left to the Secretary of State for Wales?"

That statement is incontrovertible. The Committee examined the Bill in great detail and at great length. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth makes noises.

Mr. Michael: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davies: I shall give way in a moment. The Committee considered the technical case and concluded that it was fundamentally flawed. It sent the promoters away, told them to carry out a further 12 months study, and said that they would have to present the findings to the then Secretary of State for Wales for a judgment about whether the scheme should proceed. I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that that is hardly an overwhelming endorsement of the scheme.

Mr. Michael: It is ludicrous for people to argue that additional work should be subject to independent scrutiny and public discussion, and then to use the fact that it is subject to independent scrutiny as a reason for suggesting that there is weakness in the previous case. The openness of scrutiny is its strength. My hon. Friend might be a little more objective about the information that he uses, rather than taking what has been circulated by an organisation that does not take advantage of objective scrutiny in the information that it puts out, which is often not 100 per cent. accurate.

Mr. Davies: I assure my hon. Friend that, when I come to the letter that he sent to Members of Parliament, I will be objective, as I shall be when I come to the glossy publication produced by the promoters. In the meantime, the fact remains that the Select Committee that examined the Bill rejected the technical evidence presented on behalf of the promoters and was not satisfied. In other words, it believed that the barrage will cause considerable flooding in Cardiff. That is incontrovertible.

The residents who object say in their leaflet:

"Can the Bill be defended if the Select Committee could only reach a majority decision and still insists on major amendments?"

We know that the Chairman of the Committee expressed considerable doubt, and that at least one member of the Committee was so concerned about the evidence presented that he felt that the Bill should have been rejected, and that all the members of the Committee were so concerned that they collectively agreed considerable amendments. Even then, they decided that they would abrogate the responsibility of taking the decision and put it off for the Secretary of State to decide. We are now asked to be party to the Bill proceeding.

The residents continue:

"Can the Bill be defended if the objections of the majority of the 70-plus petitioners against the Bill have still not been satisfied?"

That case stands by itself. They continue:

"Can the Bill be defended if local polls show that most local residents are opposed to it, even though they have been given no chance to vote properly on the issue?"

Why does not the Cardiff Bay development corporation undertake, with the Cardiff city council and South Glamorgan county council, a referendum in the city of Cardiff? All the evidence could be given and residents could cast a vote on it. If that happened, we should have some evidence on which to base our claims that residents are for or against the barrage. If my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth acknowledges that residents who vote against it at election time are being given the chance to vote on the issue, why does he not now ask the CBDC to organise a referendum? I guarantee that if he accepts to be bound by the results of the referendum, and to withdraw the Bill if the vote is against it, I will agree to be bound by the results of the referendum and will withdraw my objection if the vote is for it. There cannot be anything fairer than that. It is important that residents be carried along. My hon. Friend will know that I have other objections, but I will make that pledge. My hon. Friend can intervene now if he wants. He does not want to take that opportunity, so perhaps we shall come back to it later.

The residents continue:

"Can the Bill be defended if one of he local MPs—one who is affected by many of these matters—and many local councillors are totally opposed to it?

Can the Bill be defended if it is vigorously opposed on environmental grounds by the NCC and the RSPB?

Can the Bill be defended if at least 12,000 inner-city homes"— with people who have already been affected by the horror of flooding—

"will be affected by the damage compensation provisions of the Bill?

Can the Bill be defended if even the promoters acknowledge that some 1,700 properties will suffer some degree of ground water related damage if the barrage is built, and others fear it will be more?

Should you not find out more now about this controversial Bill and why the Cardiff Bay barrage should not be built?" That is the view of local residents, not the view of Members of Parliament or those who have a particular interest and are pushing one case or the other. The individuals who are directly affected say that they do not want the carry-over motion to succeed.

Mr. Michael: It is the view of those who published the leaflet, not the view of residents within the area.

Mr. Davies: I offered my hon. Friend the opportunity to determine public opinion on the matter. I could not be fairer than that——

Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill [Lords]

Question again proposed.

10.13 pm

Mr. Ron Davies: I seem to have a technical problem: I do not seem to have my notes. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) is expressing his condolences, but I was not prepared to leave them on my seat while my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) was guarding them. I am not suggesting for a moment that he would have taken them away, but there is a possibility that he might have reordered them.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): I assure my hon. Friend that I do not have the slightest interest in reading his notes, having heard the identical speech for the fourth time.

Mr. Davies: I must correct my hon. Friend, because this is only the third time that I have made this speech. The first was on Second Reading, and the second was on the carry-over motion.

As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a considerable number of right hon. and hon. Members voted on the 10 o'clock motion, and we must place it on record that the House has decided that the debate should proceed. Therefore, I hope that no artificial device will be deployed later in an attempt to short-circuit the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth has just returned from the Lobby, having voted with more than 160 other right hon. and hon. Members to continue the debate. I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker —out of respect for those of us who opposed the motion and who did not want the debate to continue until a late hour, but who will honour the decision—will not permit a closure motion later. I trust that my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth will be consistent and will ensure that there is a full debate. I sincerely hope that he will not attempt to move a closure.

Mr. Michael: The whole gist of my argument was that we should have a full and proper debate on the Committee's report. My hon. Friend surely accepts that the rules of the House exist to protect all right hon. and hon. Members and are there for them to use. My hon. Friend uses them enthusiastically, so I am sure that he would not want to deny to others that same right.

Mr. Davies: We must all exercise our rights, as well as observe the rules of the House in the way that is intended. I was merely pointing out that the House had been given a clear demonstration that right hon. and hon. Members want to continue the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said that it is important that we should thrash out the matters in question, so I hope that he will not seek now artifically to restrict the debate.

When moving the original carry-over motion, my hon. Friend said that we should endorse the development that has already occurred and not oppose any further development of the bay. I must make it abundantly clear yet again that we are not opposed to the development of Cardiff bay. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth is rolling his eyes and tutting. He should not do so, but ought to take at face value the points that I and many other hon. Members want to put to him.

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds is among the bodies that want to see Cardiff bay developed. It devised, at considerable trouble and expense, an alternative scheme, which it presented to the Select Committee, development corporation, local authorities and Members of Parliament. The RSPB made it clear to us all that it is not opposed to the development of the bay. All that is in question is whether the barrage is a necessary prerequisite or will facilitate that development. There is considerable doubt about that. My hon. Friend must accept the considerable body of evidence presented to the Select Committee, suggesting that the development could proceed without the barrage.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth should accept also that the development that has already been undertaken even before the barrage has been approved by Parliament is of a kind that he applauds and wants, and it can continue regardless of whether or not the barrage is built.

Mr. Michael indicated dissent.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend should not shake his head. The proof of my argument is that which has already been built; the evidence has been presented to the Select Committee. The considerable development that has already occurred is proof positive that such work can progress without the barrage. He must accept that that is a considerable body of evidence.

Mr. Michael: It is not.

Mr. Davies: If my hon. Friend does not accept that, he must agree that there is evidence to that effect.

My hon. Friend also mentioned that there would be an improvement to the environment. He said that there would be a better future and a better environment. He knows that it is principally due to my concern about damage to the environment that I oppose the Bill. I hope that he understands that, because my views are sincerely held and are endorsed by hundreds of thousands of people in this country. My hon. Friend is right to say that those people are not directly affected as they do not live in Cardiff, but that does not invalidate their right to an opinion on whether the barrage is environmentally damaging. They have a right to an opinion because the environment of Cardiff bay is part of our common heritage in Britain.

I maintain that, although I live in my constituency of Caerphilly, I have as much right to express my anxiety about damage to the environment in Cardiff as anyone who lives there. People who live in Sandy in Bedfordshire, for example—the home of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds—have an equally valid right to express their concern about the environment, because it does not belong to the people of Cardiff, but is part of our national natural heritage.

In some circumstances my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth argues the case for conservation internationally. I am sure that he will say that the persecution of cetaceans is wrong. I believe that he has made representations to the Norwegian Government about the persecution of some species of whale. He is entitled to do so, as whales are part of our international heritage, and as a Member of Parliament he has an international responsibility to discharge.

I know that my hon. Friend will join me in condemning the destruction of herds of African elephants for their ivory. He nods in agreement. He accepts that such herds are part of our international heritage, and that the Governments and peoples of the countries where elephants are being destroyed have a responsibility to the international community to protect them.

The environment in Cardiff bay is of national and international importance in exactly the same way. Nationally, it is important because it has been declared such as a site of special scientific interest. Internationally, the site is important because the birds that use it are not restricted to Britain but include migrants. As a result, the bay has been awarded protection through our international obligations under Ramsar. The site is also covered by the European directive on the conservation of wild birds.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth does not deny that national Governments have a right to sign the Ramsar convention. The importance of the sites covered by Ramsar is international.

I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that we all have a responsibility for the environment in Cardiff. He cannot keep the right to destroy that environment to himself or to the people of Cardiff.

If it could be proved that there was an overwhelming need for the destruction of the environment there and for the development of the barrage to proceed he would have a case. Then we would be able to weigh up the relative benefits and importance of conservation areas against the economic benefits that would result from a development that was contingent on the destruction of the SSSI. If that were the case, my hon. Friend would have a strong point, but the economic case for the development has not been proved. That is why my hon. Friend must address the site of special scientific interest question: why is he prepared to support the destruction of part of our priceless natural heritage for an unproven and unquantifiable economic benefit?

Mr. Michael: I understand the philosophy that underlies what my hon. Friend says: that we have a mutual responsibility for the worldwide environment. However, the Taff-Ely SSSI is a site of national, not international, importance for wild birds. As part of the Severn estuary area, it constitutes a potential, but not an actual, protection area. I believe that the economic case has been made, that we have a responsibility to balance the economic and the environmental arguments, that in this specific location the environmental argument has none of the strength that my hon. Friend has sought to give to it and that it is certainly not comparable with other examples that he gave of sites of international importance.

Mr. Davies rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that we are dealing with a carry-over motion. I am sure that he will relate his remarks to the motion.

Mr. Davies: I shall do so precisely, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is precisely because conservation has not been dealt with properly, either by the promoters or in Committee, that I oppose the carry-over motion. The SSSI question was not addressed, either by the developers or in Committee. The Committee took a lot of evidence. It agreed that some of the operations would be very damaging and that there would be a considerable loss of wildlife. However, the question of how the destruction of that priceless asset could be justified was not answered. My hon. Friend may say that that SSSI is more or less important than other SSSIs. I accept that there must be a gradation—that SSSIs may be of greater or lesser importance—but my hon. Friend has not answered certain questions.

First, why is the destruction of this SSSI justified? Why must it be destroyed, in the absence of overwhelming economic evidence? Secondly, and more crucially, if we allowed this SSSI, which deserves international protection, to be destroyed, how on earth could we deny the development of other SSSIs? My hon. Friend has not grasped the point that the destruction of one SSSI would lead to the destruction of the whole system. It would invalidate the protection that is offered to all the other SSSIs.

Mr. Michael: That does not follow.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend says that that does not follow. In what circumstances, therefore, would he oppose the development of other SSSIs?

Mr. Michael: I shall have to refrain from intervening so often, even though my hon. Friend is so provocative. However, he has just said that there must be a gradation and that one must consider whether a balance can be struck. My hon. Friend answered his own question; I do not need to do it for him. He has given no credence to the positive efforts that have been made to provide a lagoon alternative. It is a unique example of promoters seeking to provide positive conservation. He must surely concede that during the discussions undertakings were given to protect wildlife. Therefore, the carry-over motion should be agreed to so that these matters can be debated fully on Report.

Mr. Davies rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Again, I must remind the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) that too many detailed arguments cannot be advanced on a carry-over motion. Of course he wishes to illustrate why he opposes the carry-over motion, but during the debate on a motion of this kind all the details cannot be gone through.

Mr. Davies: I accept that entirely, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall try to comply with your strictures. My hon. Friend made two points that are worthy of comment. I accept that there is an alternative. That was considered in Committee. I shall deal with the alternative later, since it is relevant to the carry-over motion.

As to the principle involved in designating SSSIs, of course I said that there must be a gradation. My view, however, is that if a site is accorded protection under British legislation it should be protected. The answer to the conundrum that my hon. Friend has posed is that all SSSIs should be protected from damaging operations.

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): In my constituency there is the wonderful bay of Broughton, where the Nature Conservancy Council has designated a site of special scientific interest. A local farmer is concerned about the rate at which land is being eroded by the sea. I know that my hon. Friend is a former geographer and a specialist in these matters. He is interested in wave-cut platforms and various other marine features. The farmer to whom I have referred is concerned that the sea is taking away his land at a remarkable rate, but the SSSI has been designated with a view to assisting the sea to erode the land even faster so that it will be possible to observe the glacial till that will become exposed. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that in certain circumstances, even when an SSSI has been designated, there may be a strong case for downgrading the designation. As I have said, I am aware of his expertise in these matters.

Mr. Davies rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that in responding to the intervention of the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) will stay within the rules of order.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) has raised a fascinating topic for consideration, and it is one of which I am aware. The answer is not to allow development that will destroy the SSSI. If my hon. Friend feels that the area to which he has referred should not have been so designated, there must be case for the removal of the protected status. If that is removed, the development will take place. No one has attempted to argue, however, that the Cardiff bay site should not be designated. Everyone recognises that the site is of immense importance, but there are still those who wish to destroy it. That is the nub of the argument, and that is why Broughton is different from Cardiff.

When these matters were discussed on Second Reading —obviously we cannot repeat the Second Reading debate this evening—the director general of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds was quoted. You will be pleased to know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the quote summarises the argument. By using the director's words rather than my own, I am sure that I can deal with the issue more quickly.

The director said:

"Cardiff Bay is one of Wales' most prestigious natural assets, holding between 5-8,000 birds each winter, including dunlin, redshank, shelduck, teal and knot. Many of these birds travel thousands of miles from as far away as Iceland, Greenland and Siberia to winter on Cardiff's ice-free bay. The birds depend on this bay for their survival. We have an international responsibility to protect it."—[Official Report, 19 December 1989; Vol. 164, c. 305.]

I do not know who the chairman of the development corporation thinks he is when he sets himself up to be a greater expert on these matters than the director general of the RSPB, who has made it clear that the development is unacceptable.

We must recognise the importance of the site and prevent the acceptance of the carry-over motion at this juncture. If we defeat the motion, the House will be making a statement that it is committed to conservation.

The importance of the site was recognised by the South Glamorgan county council. My hon. Friend the Member for Gower has said that in 1979 the county council, in the preparation of its structure plan, which was subsequently approved, recognised the site as a conservation area. That was its future design for the bay. There was no objection to the classification and no attempt to remove it, until someone had the idea of constructing a barrage.

When I referred to the petitioners' objections, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth invited me to refer the promoters' literature. The letter that he sent asking us to support the motion—I am sure that he will not mind my referring to it, because it is an open letter—says:

"The Bill has the support of the Wales TUC and many individual organisations and trade unions in Wales and the locality. While there are still some opponents, it is clear that the Barrage will benefit Cardiff and South Wales substantially more than other schemes."

Not only are there still some opponents, but their number has been growing. He should have said, "It is true that there are more opponents than there were", but instead he said

"there are still some opponents".

He also said,

"It is clear that the barrage will benefit Cardiff."

I urge my hon. Friend to think again, because that has not been proved. He is arguing that we should destroy a priceless asset for an unquantifiable benefit. He does not appear to realise that, which is a source of some distress to me.

The letter continues:

"There is to be an innovative new feeding ground for the displaced wading birds while the new cleaner environment will attract birds which have not hitherto been seen in the neighbourhood."

He argues that as a benefit of the development and attempts to persuade us to vote for the carry-over motion on that basis. The lake was the subject of detailed consideration in Committee. The new birds that my hon. Friend refers to were the subject of a question put by the promoters to their own witness. They said, "What will these birds be?". They will be swans perhaps, mallard perhaps and a few seagulls perhaps. In conservation terms, the provision of an area of open water to facilitate swans and mallard does not constitute much compensation for the loss of an internationally important feeding ground for thousands of endangered waders.

Mr. Michael: I invite my hon. Friend to read the evidence that has been provided, including the published document commissioned by the development corporation from the Wildfowl Trust—obviously it would be inappropriate to deal with that in this debate—which deals in extenso with the matter. He is trying to denigrate an important development for an inner-city area of great dereliction.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend should not make such accusations. I have the evidence given by Dr. John Goss Custard from the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology, who was the expert witness called by the promoters. On day eight —it appears on page 24 of the evidence—he was asked by the promoters:

"As an ornithologist could you perhaps just indicate which sort of wildfowl are likely to be attracted to the impounded waters? A. I should think, given the numbers of people that are likely to be in the vicinity, rather common ones such as mute swans and mallards and birds of that kind. That would be my guess."

That is the evidence of the promoters. I leave my hon. Friend to reply to that point if he feels it appropriate.

The people who oppose the motion include all the conservation bodies that have considered the evidence submitted to the Committee. I do not want unnecessarily to delay the House, but I have the detailed questioning——

Mr. Morgan: There is another hour to go.

Mr. Davies: There is certainly another hour. My hon. Friend is trying to encourage me—but we must not unnecessarily delay the House. I shall not go into the detail of that argument, and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will be grateful for that.

I wish to reply briefly to some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West, who has been encouraging me to turn my attention to him. He has been involved in the debate. On Second Reading, we had a difference of opinion about the conservation value of the site and what would happen to the birds. I asked the RSPB whether it would write to my hon. Friend, and I know that it did so, because I have a copy of the letter. I hope that my hon. Friend will not mind my reading it. The RSPB wrote:

"The fate of estuarine birds displaced is complex and not fully researched. Experts advising both Promoters and Petitioners against the Bill agree that a large proportion of those displaced by a barrage would not be able to 'fit in' elsewhere, or would displace other birds in turn. The availability of suitable habitat is finite; areas of international importance such as the Severn estuary, of which the Taff/Ely is a part, are to be treasured accordingly. Loss of an important part would cause an overall nett loss in the world population of species affected. The Promoters accept that some loss will have to be compensated for, by introducing a measure in the Bill to create an artificially engineered mudflat system at the Wentloog Levels. . . As to the 'adaptability' of nature"—

I hope that this point will persuade my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West that we should stop the passage of the Bill—

"we believe that nature does not adapt, rather that some bird species take advantage of conditions artificially created by man which mimic (accidentally or by design) natural conditions. An example is the crow".

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West is aware of the argument. The RSPB's view is clear. In a briefing submitted to us, it said:

"What will happen to the birds? If the barrage is built and the bay flooded, the wading birds displaced will have to seek their fortunes elsewhere. Birds such as knot, dunlin and redshank will attempt to find fresh feeding grounds and many will fail. They will find that the size of the larder available in the Severn—indeed in all other estuaries within flying range —is limited. In most years, all the best alternative feeding areas are full up with other birds. Many will be excluded from feeding in these areas by competition from other birds, and will die of starvation. Some will successfully displace other birds from their feeding grounds. Those birds in turn will die.

This phenomenon will not take place instantaneously, so no spectacular heap of birds will accumulate. Over a short period of time, birds will disperse elsewhere—some may travel well away from Cardiff in search of food. They will die in ones and twos, many crawling into a secluded place to expire. Imagine the public outcry if honourable members sanctioned the mass destruction of 5,000 birds by, say, shooting or poison. There would be a heap of bodies for the popular press to feast upon. There would be a scandal of major proportions. Elected representatives, be they councillors or members of this House, would not get re-elected because of the outcry. What is being proposed in this Bill by South Glamorgan County Council and the Cardiff Bay Development Corporation, aided and abetted by the Welsh Office, will have the same effect on birds as buckshot or poison."

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): The hon. Gentleman wholly misrepresents the balance of the evidence given to the Committee. I do not believe that even those people who appeared on behalf of those who objected to the Bill suggested a scenario along those lines. How many of the books published by the RSPB or any other body concerned with birds suggest that Cardiff bay is a location to which those interested in seeing birds should go?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) is going to comment on that intervention, I am sure that he will relate his remarks to the carry-over motion.

Mr. Davies: I do not particularly want to get involved in that matter. I assure the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) that I shall write to him, giving a full answer.

Mr. Morgan: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davies: Having suggested that it would be inappropriate for me to reply to the intervention of the hon. Member for Keighley, I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would rule that it was similarly inappropriate for me to give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West—at least if he wants to develop the same argument.

Mr. Morgan: I wanted to point out what was wrong with the argument.

Mr. Davies: I hope that my hon. Friend will be making an intervention—albeit perhaps a brief one—later in the debate.

My final point concerns the promoters' case as outlined in the glossy book that they have handed out. They refer to "the living environment", and say that considerable improvements will result from the development. There is a lovely photograph of high tide in the bay, but there is precious little substance to the text, which reads:

"An exciting new development in practical conservation will be the new 55 acre feeding ground for overwintering birds at Wentloog some 3·5 miles east of the bay. This will be partial compensation for the loss of the mudflats to be covered by the lake. The Severn Estuary has 39,000 more acres of . . . designated inter-tidal area, including the River Rhymney, which the Corporation will protect and enhance as a particularly important feeding ground."

The promoters appear to be making two points. First, they are implying that, because there are a further 39,000 acres, it is all right to destroy those affected by the Bill. I reject that argument. If they can destroy one part of the bay, they can come back next year and say, "There are still 39,000 acres; let us have another 1,000." Who will we be to stop them if we have not said no at this stage?

Secondly, the promoters claim that an exciting new development in practical conservation is to take place. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth has invited us to consider that in deciding whether we should allow the Bill to proceed. Less than 1 acre is being provided for every 10 acres being destroyed. I do not think that that is a particularly good bargain. I do not regard it as an exciting new development in practical conservation to destroy 500 acres of protected wildlife habitat and to provide 50 acres as compensation.

Even if one accepts, as I do, incidentally, that the development corporation is trying to offer compensation —perhaps it realises the damage that it is wreaking and feels that it must do something—one must accept that what is being proposed is not very satisfactory. The site will be an area scooped out of the shore of the Severn. There will be no natural drainage, so it will be impossible to recreate the habitats that are to be destroyed. We are not talking about an area that will be flooded once or twice a day, enriching the bed that provides the invertebrate food that attracts the birds; there will not be any. The promoters will not be creating the environment that has been lost.

[Mr. Davies]

Moreover—and this is worse—the site is adjacent to a large refuse tip, which presents two further problems. First, there will be a considerable amount of leaching out of the refuse tip and that will pollute the lagoon. Even if we assume that that will not happen—although why we should assume that, I do not know—we know for sure that thousands and thousands of gulls feed on that tip. Those gulls will prevent the lagoon from becoming a refuge for the secretive, sensitive wading birds for which it has been provided. As the gulls feed, they fly up and roost on the water. If dunlin and redshank were attracted, they would certainly be driven off by the gulls.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: Perhaps my hon. Friend can help me over the management of gulls on waste disposal sites. Are not there ways of preventing gulls from reaching the sites, including the use of falcons?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) will help me by referring rather more closely to the carry-over motion.

Mr. Davies: I hope that the development corporation will not get the idea that falcons will help them to attract wading birds. I am sure that they would get rid of gulls but I am afraid that the redshank, the dunlin and the knot would go with them. They are not usually very happy to be overflown by sparrowhawks and goshawks, which are the predators that prey on most birds, although peregrines might do the job as well.

Let us get back to the point. We will have a scoop taken out of the shore, which is supposed to be attractive to those birds, next to a refuse tip that has thousands of gulls and where leaching comes into the water. In addition, many high-voltage electricity cables pass overhead. I do not know whether the development corporation is proposing to relocate them, but one can imagine the carnage that could be created. I am sure that while the redshanks are still in Cardiff my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth will have taken the opportunity to have a look at them and that he will have noticed their formations as they take off into flight. High-voltage overhead cables will not do their formation dancing much good. That is another problem, and another reason why I do not think that the barrage is a good idea. We should not accept it.

In addition, the barrage is an experiment. Why on earth should we be prepared to accept the destruction of something that we know is good and valuable for something which is unquantified and unproven? The new lagoon will have to be maintained—at what cost and for how long we do not know. Presumably, the public will have to pay in the short term. We do not know what is going to happen, but we do know that the conditions that are necessary to provide feeding opportunities for waders will be destroyed in that maintenance process. One cannot bring in bulldozers and dredgers to dredge the mud—although it will have to be done to prevent the site silting up—and still maintain the area as a quiet, peaceful, settled refuge for wildlife. When my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth says that an alternative is being provided, we must stop for a moment and look at what is being presented.

There are many arguments. I do not think that the development corporation has understood the deep-rooted objections of environmentalists or the problems associated with groundwater in Cardiff. I know that that matter concerns my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West and that he will seek to comment on it in a moment or two. In addition, local people are concerned about their local circumstances—about their homes, livelihoods and immediate environment. In conjunction with them, hundreds of thousands of other people are concerned at the destruction of the environment which belongs to us. Those two views represent an overwhelming coalition opposed to the barrage. That overwhelming case is why I oppose the barrage and why I hope that the carry-over motion will not be carried and that we shall put a stop to this sorry saga once and for all.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I rise to make the case against the carry-over motion because, like my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), as I oppose the Bill, I must therefore oppose the carry-over motion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) made an eloquent and moving speech which we shall take fully into account. He referred to a most distinguished member of the city council, Councillor John Reynolds. John Reynolds and I fought as candidates for the nomination for the Cardiff, North seat in 1966. I was successful and entered the House a couple of weeks later. Such was the quality of Councillor John Reynolds then—as it remained throughout his life—that, despite the vivid disappointment of that occasion, he never gave less than unstinting support; in every sense, he backed me throughout my time as the hon. Member for Cardiff, North while he continued as a Cardiff councillor. Like my hon. Friend, I wish to pay him that tribute.

A distinguished socialist once said that socialism is the language of priorities. If it is, we must oppose this Bill on public expenditure grounds. I first raised this matter in the debate on the carry-over motion on 14 November last year. I was never called to order during my speech, because the financial consequences of Bills for public expenditure are fundamental to the nature of parliamentary accountability. My case this evening is that, in the context of the Welsh Office budget and the needs of the Principality, I and many other Welsh Members oppose the level of expenditure that the Bill—and, it seems, Welsh Office Ministers and the Chancellor—would endorse.

I make no apology for raising this issue again. It has been my role in debates on this Bill to discuss its implications for public expenditure. We must establish what have been, what are and what will be the public expenditure consequences of the Bill before deciding whether to carry it over.

I am sorry to chide my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth, as I did in the debate in November last year and on Second Reading. He made an eloquent speech about the character of the Bill and its impact on his part of the city, but, as a major supporter of the Bill, he never said a single word about its public expenditure consequences. That might not be his function here, but it is certainly the function of the Minister. On the two previous occasions when this Bill was debated, the Minister confined himself to some rather modest and peripheral remarks, but tonight we hope for a rather deeper analysis from him of the implications for Welsh Office expenditure.

Mr. Michael: I am sure that my hon. Friend will not chide me for welcoming investment in my constituency which will bring benefit to my constituents in terms of the local economy and jobs. I am sure he would do the same if investment came to his constituency.

I mentioned earlier the background information with which I have supplied my hon. Friends, although that is more a matter for discussion on Report.

Mr. Rowlands: Of course I do not chide my hon. Friend for his efforts on behalf of his constituents. But the Bill that he brings to the House has enormous implications for Welsh public expenditure. Huge amounts of public expenditure should not be discussed on Report. They are to do with mainstream, fundamental parliamentary accountability and they should be discussed root and branch in a debate on whether to allow the Bill to carry over. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth and I have had this exchange once before, but I maintain that this is not a matter for Report stage. This is a fundamental matter; if the Bill is not carried over it goes back to the start. My arguments are not about Report but about the very nature of the Bill and its public expenditure consequences.

I hope that I am not being too presumptuous when I say that I have taken a lead in expressing a concern that is shared by other hon. Members in that I have drawn to the attention of hon. Members the public expenditure aspects of the Bill. I shall attempt to identify the public expenditure related to the Bill. The front of the Bill shows two figures. Paragraph 3 states:

"The expenditure on construction of the proposed works is estimated at £82,230,000. The expenditure on the acquisition of lands and easements for the works is estimated at £2,550,000."

I shall return to those figures.

It is strange that exactly the same amounts were shown in the original Bill. I understand the procedural problems involved in amending a financial memorandum. Are those two amounts still valid? Have they been updated? We should bear in mind that they are only one aspect of the financial consequences of the Bill. I hope that the Minister will give us that information. That is not the responsibility of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth. It is the responsibility of the Minister, because I assume that the financial memorandum must be endorsed by the Treasury.

Mr. Morgan: The truth, if the Minister were willing to state it, is that the face of the Bill should show that expenditure will be whatever it costs eventually to build the barrage. The amount does not matter to the Welsh Office so long as it saves the face of the last Secretary of State for Wales but one.

Mr. Rowlands: I am trying to be as objective as possible. Let us examine the matter stage by stage and figure by figure. I should not go as far as my hon. Friend, although there is some substantiation for his point in Hansard. In the debate on 19 December last year, the figures given did not even remotely represent the total public expenditure consequences of carrying out the scheme. On that date, the Minister said that £31·5 million would be available this year. He said:

"over the next three years, Government funding would total £100 million, bringing the total amount given, or announced, to date to some £150 million."—[Official Report, 19 December 1989; Vol. 164, c. 308.]

Over and above the financial memorandum on the face of the original Bill, there was a straightforward admission that there was a formal commitment. It was not prospective but committed money to the tune of £150 million over three years.

Mr. Michael: I should like to clarify a constituency point that I am sure my hon. Friend will understand. As my hon. Friend rightly says, the Minister must answer for the Welsh Office. In the financial requirements, things that will happen anyway have to be counted in and included on the face of the Bill. For example, roads have to be included because that is how definition of these matters goes. The provision of alternative sites for wading birds, water quality and dredging are also included, as are matters such as sewer diversification and modification, which will cost £13·8 million. All these projects will go ahead anyway, but the requirements of the legislative process are such that they have to be included in the figures used in the Bill, although they are essential for bringing new life to this derelict part of south Cardiff, with which my hon. Friend is familiar. I am sure that he will accept that we should be looking at those aspects that are dependent on the barrage, which is the subject of the Bill before us, rather than at other aspects which, by accident of legal requirement, have to be included in it, or at the other work of the development corporation that is not dependent on the Bill.

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. We have had this discussion on previous occasions, and I understand that included in the broad total is expenditure that would be necessary anyway, and that it would be best to identify the two. Let us identify the two, and then we can unravel the figures, and let us not say that the total cost of the barrage is anything like that given in the Bill.

I shall first develop my point, although I am happy to give way to my hon. Friend at each and every stage because I am in the process of being educated, as I hope that I shall educate my hon. Friend. We also need educating by the Minister.

One of the most amazing things ever said by the Minister came in the debate last December. Having announced that £150 million would be allocated, he then said something that I would love him to say about the valleys initiative, or about any other project that any hon. Member representing a Welsh constituency advocated. He said:

"Beyond that, we will ensure that sufficient funding will be made available to enable the corporation to carry through its task."—[Official Report, 19 December 1989; Vol. 164, c. 308.]

That simple statement means that the Cardiff Bay development corporation will be given by the Welsh Office whatever funds it requires to finish its task.

I wish that this or any previous Secretary of State had made such a statement about the needs of Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, so that if the costs of a project there escalate, or the whole thing goes awry, or the financial assumptions behind it are wrong—as the barrage scheme is heavily involved in property, the environment now and the future environment lead to some doubts about the financial forecasts of the scheme—the Welsh Office will fund the task of the corporation. That is an enormous commitment, and its open-ended character must be of concern to any hon. Member representing a Welsh constituency, because we are fighting for the same money.

We have all been in this game long enough to know that Chancellors are right when they say that there is not a bottomless pit, that there are priorities in, and competing demands for, public expenditure. We all have to make difficult and often odious choices. As a Member representing a traditional community, I have every reason to say that we would love to be told, "Beyond that, we will ensure that sufficient funding will be made available to enable Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney to carry through its tasks." I should love to have such a commitment from Welsh Office Ministers. Because it has been given once, we are concerned that it might be given again—but it all has to come from one budget. We spend that budget in a gentlemanly and comradely fashion, having competed for it in our different ways. It is a matter of great concern and I shall not support the motion.

Even if I considered that statement to have been an aberration, or simply that it required qualification, I should wish us to consider the current public expenditure commitment compared with the commitment when we last discussed the issue. I first raised the question of expenditure on various items during our debate on a carry-over motion on 14 November last. I suspect that the original cost of about £82 million was to cover the capital infrastructure costs of the barrage. What is the figure now?

Mr. Michael: I wish to help my hon. Friend, so that we do not spend too much time on questions that can easily be answered. The £83·27 million includes the barrage structure, the locks, the refuge harbour, the fish passes and the sluices—and roads and services. That is my point: it includes elements that would be required anyway.

Mr. Rowlands: That is a compendium of elements. I was given a document today. I have not had time to go through it, and no doubt my hon. Friend can educate me as we proceed. The document is entitled, "Cardiff bay barrage—planning update and economic appraisal statement." I am sure that the Minister has it to hand. It is dated 5 January 1990. It is a revised review of the public expenditure consequences.

From appendix 1, table 2, it appears that the barrage infrastructure cost—not including roads or all the other elements mentioned by my hon. Friend—total £125·5 million. That is not £82 million. Is that correct?

Mr. Michael: The figure does not include the other elements.

Mr. Rowlands: It does not?

Mr. Michael: No.

Mr. Rowlands: Below that figure comes a whole host of industrial costs such as demolition and clearance, service diversions and so on. I totted up those figures and they came to £148 million—that is, additional to the £125·5 million. I shall come to the bottom figure in a moment.

On improved access, the review shows that the PDR-Butetown link plus other road schemes, car parking and a light rapid transport system will cost £152 million. We all agree that the PDR-Butetown link is essential, and it is currently on the books at £95·9 million. What was the figure when we last debated the issue? There has been a substantial increase.

Mr. Morgan: When the Cardiff Bay development corporation was established, the estimated cost of the PDR-Butetown link was £50 million, but its outturn cost is now estimated to be £126 million. The Minister is shaking his head. Perhaps he wishes to correct me. I was supplied with that figure by the department within the county council that will have the responsibility of commissioning the building of the road.

The additional £76 million has been caused entirely by the CBDC asking the county council, in 1987, not to proceed but to wait until there had been various design changes. That additional £76 million must be loaded on to the costs of the interference of the CBDC. That would not have happened if the CBDC had not been established to build the barrage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) is dealing with the finances in considerable detail. I hope that he will link it to the carry-over motion.

Mr. Rowlands: I most certainly will. When I come to the bottom figure even your jaw might drop, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If we carry the motion over, we will endorse a public expenditure consequence of the Bill even greater than that which we were asked to endorse at the end of last year. I am seeking information on the limits and extremities of the Bill so that I may come to a conclusion on it, although my objections to it are pretty fundamental anyway.

According to the revised document, the barrage infrastructure cost is £125 million; industrial relocations, demolition and land reclamation I crudely totted up at about £148 million; improved access and the road schemes, £152 million; environmental improvements such as landscaping, water features, and so on, £96 million; and other projects, £25 million. The sum total of that list is £547·29 million.

When we debated the matter on 19 December, the Minister admitted:

> "The total cost to the development corporation is estimated. . .to be some £402 million."—[Official Report, 19 December; Vol. 164, c. 309.]

Is the £402 million equivalent to the present figure of £547 million? If not, what should be deducted from the £547 million? That figure of £402 million, not the £82 million on the face of the Bill, is the total public expenditure Welsh Office consequence of the Bill.

Mr. Michael: No.

Mr. Rowlands: It is. My hon. Friend is getting het up. We can deduct from that the Butetown link and the rest, but we are now talking about more than £400 million gross. Am I reading the appendices correctly when I say that the £402 million figure is now £547 million?

Mr. Michael: I simply make the point that my hon. Friend is including figures that have nothing to do with the Bill even under the definition which draws in things such as the roads, because the development is in south Cardiff, as well as the elements which are on the face of the Bill, many of which, as I explained earlier, would have to take place anyway. There is an element of confusion, although I accept entirely that my hon. Friend is an earnest seeker after truth in these matters.

Mr. Rowlands: I am an earnest seeker after truth. The £547 million figures comes from the "Cardiff bay barrage —planning update and economic appraisal statement", not from Cardiff or South Glamorgan. Therefore, any hon. Member would have to conclude that the £547 million relates to the barrage and its financial consequences. It is not every bit of expenditure in South Glamorgan or in the city of Cardiff; it is related, in one form or another, to the cost of the Cardiff bay barrage and its consequences. Half that amount would probably be essential in another development.

I am not arguing about that. I am simply saying that, whereas at the end of last year we had a figure of a little more than £400 million, we now have a figure of about £547 million. To save time, will the Minister say whether the previous figure of £402 million equates with the present figure of £547 million? Are they comparable figures or is there anything substantially different in them? Well, I hope that the Minister will allow us to intervene on his speech so that that point can be cleared up.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): It seems to me that, if the carry-over motion were approved tonight, that approval would in a sense endorse all the financial confusion. If my hon. Friend is saying that all this financial information must be clarified before we proceed any further with the Bill, that, surely, is a strong argument for opposing the motion.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend has made very forcefully a point that I made in regard to the last carry-over motion—and we lost that vote, although I do not think that we lost the argument.

I feel that, given the public expenditure consequences of private Bills of this size—especially when they involve Welsh Office collusion to such an extent, and an open-ended cheque book too—we have a right to argue our case. Although I am a passionate supporter of public expenditure, I also accept that it is all about priorities: the money must come from somewhere, and in this instance it will come from other budgets which are of vital concern to other parts of the Principality.

One of my fundamental criticisms of private Bill procedure is that, when—after a Committee has spent weeks considering the issues—one of us asks a simple question about the likely cost, as any hon. Member might do on the Floor of the House, the most that we get is some vague statement. I quoted a marvellous one on 14 November, which said that the cost might be between £75 million and £125 million. That is the order of the evidence given by—on that occasion—the chairman of the Cardiff Bay development corporation.

Even those of us who, like me, are passionate supporters of public expenditure are supposed to be vigilant in that regard. I really do not feel that we can pass the motion without much more clarification than has so far been provided—and, in any event, the public expenditure consequences of the Bill are bound to be enormous.

Expanding on the third point that I raised, I accept that I am treading on less firm ground: here I must deal with city expenditure. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) can speak about Cardiff much more effectively than I can; I have been speaking about the needs and budgetary priorities of Wales as a whole. My hon. Friend is right to fight for his patch, but I am fighting with equal vigour to ensure that his fight does not cause an unwelcome ripple effect in communities such as mine.

This scheme is, in effect, an enormous plan to build houses—very high-class ones, in many instances—that is, in the main, supposedly led by private enterprise. I do not think it improper of me to ask how it can be described as a private-enterprise-led scheme when it will require about £550 million of public money—and not in the form of a loan or a guarantee, but in the form of public grant from the Welsh Office budget. We are encountering some curious semantics when huge slugs of public money are described as "private enterprise".

Following the pre-empting of significant amounts of Welsh Office money, the benefit to the city council will be non-existent. It is for the electors to decide whether they wish to carry the burden. However, I feel that I should point out that after all that public money has been invested, the result will be an operational loss per annum.

Earlier, my hon. Friend told me that I had got my figures wrong. I accepted that, and went away with my tail between my legs. Originally, I was told that the figure was only £400,000 per annum, and that it was modest by comparison with the cost of running Cardiff's parks, and so on. How sanguine should we be in the light of the revised economic appraisal? As at January, the net operating costs are now said to be not £400,000 but £1·3 million. Am I interpreting table 3 in appendix I correctly? It seems to me that it relates to the same figures that were the subject of our earlier argument, when my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth sought to educate me.

The forecast revenue has increased from £470 million to only £480 million, but the costs have risen to £1·8 million, and the net operating costs—which I suppose to mean the net annual operating deficit—are now set at £1·35 million.

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend is placing a fair interpretation on the figures. The corporation will bear the cost during its lifetime, and the successor body—which we assume will be the local authority—will not have to burden the community charge, or the successor to it that I hope will be in place by then, because the corporation's assets will then be available. The intention is to create sufficient revenue to fund the cost. That is why I made the comparison with the £3 million needed for Cardiff's parks. I assure my hon. Friend that aspect has been carefully considered by my colleagues on Cardiff city council.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend offers a different argument from that which he produced when we last debated the matter, when he told me that the annual cost would be a mere £400,000. At least he is now admitting that, in the course of just nine months, that figure has increased to £1·3 million. I am glad to have that valid comparison made clear.

My hon. Friend says that after the corporation is wound up its assets will be handed over to the successor body and will produce sufficient revenue to cover the operating costs. Those assets will have been created from the enormous grant made by the Welsh Office, and we must assume that, at the end of it all, there will be a substantial potential profit. I ask the Minister, as I have before, whether the Welsh Office will be able to claw back any portion of the £400 million originally mentioned, or the £550 million now suggested, that it is to make available?

If some of the profits are to return to the Welsh Office, at least a proportion of them could be recycled to the benefit of Merthr Tydfil and Rhymney and other parts of the Principality. Can the Minister say whether any part of the Welsh Office's £550 million commitment to the development corporation will be returned not to the city's coffers—because it is not local but Welsh money, provided by taxpayers nationally—but to the Welsh Office?

I have previously begged the Minister to answer that fundamental question, and I hope that he will do so on this occasion. In terms of public expenditure, besides all the environmental arguments, I cannot support a carry-over motion for the Bill when the public expenditure consequences will not merely have such great significance for parts of Cardiff, but could be to the considerable detriment and loss of the rest of the Principality, and to the communities which I represent.

11.29 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ian Grist): I join the hon. Members for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) and for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) in paying tribute to the work of councillors who serve on the corporation in Cardiff, and especially the late Councillor John Reynolds, who was a political opponent. I remember him standing for Cardiff, North. He was a thoroughly principled man, and a true friend of Cardiff.

It may be helpful if I give the House a brief indication of the Government's position on the Bill and the amendments made by the Committee. The House will know from previous debates that the Government have a substantial interest in the objectives of the Bill.

We have carefully considered the detailed and wide-ranging evidence on all aspects of a barrage across the estuaries of the Taff and Ely, and concluded that the economic case is very strong, even taking into account the environmental considerations. The Government believe therefore that the construction of a barrage and the substantial economic, recreational and other benefits arising from it are the key to the redevelopment of the Cardiff bay area. This imaginative and high-quality redevelopment will transform not just our capital city, but the wider economy of south Wales and the image of Wales as a whole. I am glad to say that this view was not seriously challenged by the majority of the Committee.

We are pleased that the Committee, having considered all the evidence, has recommended that the Bill should be allowed to proceed subject to a number of amendments and undertakings, mainly relating to groundwater. It is right that the Committee should reflect the genuine concerns expressed during its lengthy and detailed examination of the evidence and, for our part, the Government would not wish to differ from their recommendations.

As this is the first opportunity to debate the Bill since it emerged from Committee, the House may also find it helpful if I say briefly how my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State proposes to fulfil the undertakings that he gave to the Committee in respect of his consideration of further work on groundwater.

My right hon. Friend has appointed Mr. Roy Stoner, director of the Institute of Irrigation Studies at Southampton university, as an independent expert to assist him in fulfilling the undertaking. Mr. Stoner is an eminent specialist in groundwater and related matters and has considerable personal experience on such projects world-wide. His appointment should command the support of all parties.

Mr. Morgan: Would the Minister spell that name please?

Mr. Grist: S-T-O-N-E-R, as it is pronounced.

The independent adviser's first task will be to confirm, by the end of this month, whether the terms of reference for the further studies by Hydrotechnica are adequate.

Once the report on the further groundwater studies and the development corporation's response have been submitted to the Secretary of State, there will be a three-month period during which written representations on the contents of those documents may be made to the Secretary of State by interested parties. The independent adviser will then advise my right hon. Friend on whether the terms of reference have been met, on the soundness of the assumptions, working methods and conclusions, on written representations and the adequacy of information on the various criteria. I expect my right hon. Friend to be able to announce his decision on public funding and the final position of the protected property line, taking into account all of these factors, early in 1992.

Mr. Morgan: Can the Minister say whether the Dr. Stoner to whom he refers has any familiarity with Cardiff? The reason why I ask is that there has been a wide separation in the professional advice received as between geologists, engineers and other experts who are from or work in Cardiff, virtually all of whom are against the barrage, as they think it unsafe, and those experts who have been commissioned but have no familiarity with the area in question, all of whom turn out to be in favour of the barrage. Will the Minister reflect on that and say whether Dr. Stoner has any working familiarity with the groundwater particularities of Cardiff?

Mr. Grist: To be perfectly frank, I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman. If he has any grounds for doubting the technical competence and the expertise of Mr. Stoner I am sure that he will let us know. I do not believe, however, that the hon. Gentleman will find that that is so. Mr. Stoner is a world-wide expert on these matters.

As the House is aware, the Government have already made available, or announced, very significant levels of funding for the corporation—more than £150 million to date. If my right hon. Friend is satisfied that the economic, technical and safety criteria in respect of the further work on groundwater have been met, we intend to honour our long-standing commitment that the cost of the barrage will be met by the development corporation, with the assistance of grant-in-aid from the Welsh Office.

I must point out to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) that the most recent economic appraisal of the barrage strategy estimates its overall public sector costs to be £335 million at mid-1989-90 prices. The two main elements of the strategy are the construction of the barrage itself and the construction of the Butetown link section of the PDR.

The Government have already made plain their commitment to provide funding for the barrage through grant-in-aid, subject now to the satisfactory completion of further work on groundwater, to which I referred earlier. The corporation will also be generating income from the disposal of assets and will be drawing in money from the private sector, all of which will go towards the funding of its barrage strategy.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney should not have overlooked in his peroration the fact that the valleys programme has led to the expenditure of some £500 million in three years. I do not think that he expects the Welsh Office to receive a refund of that money. That is part of the investment in the future wellbeing of Wales, and that is precisely what the barrage strategy is also designed to achieve.

Mr. Rowlands: The hon. Gentleman is racing through his figures. He referred to the figure of £335 million. Is he saying that the figure of £402 million that he gave to us in December is now £335 million? Are we comparing like with like?

Mr. Grist: I think that the hon. Gentleman will agree that that is a fairly gratifying drop in the amount of public sector money, due to the introduction of private sector finance. He ought to welcome the injection of finance by the development corporation if he is so mindful of public finance.

Mr. Rowlands: Table 2 in the appendix to the economic appraisal published in January quoted a gross figure of £547 million. What proportion of that figure is Welsh Office funded?

Mr. Grist: I think that the hon. Gentleman is looking at an outturn figure. The outturn figure for the barrage is estimated at £147·7 million.

Mr. Rowlands: The document entitled "Cardiff bay barrage—planning update and economic appraisal statement" dated 15 January 1990 gives, in table 2 of appendix 1, a summary of individual project investments. The barrage figure is £125 million. The rest comes to a grand total of £547 million. What proportion of the £547 million will be Welsh Office funded?

Mr. Grist: The hon. Gentleman cites a figure that I do not have before me. I have given him the figures that I have, which relate to the motion before the House. We estimate that the barrage strategy itself, at 1989 prices, will be £335 million. There would clearly be funding from many other sources. The leverage with a barrage is twice that which would be available without it. That is a measure of the importance of the barrage for the regeneration of south Cardiff and the area around Cardiff.

Therefore, I believe that the Bill as amended in Committee, where it was given detailed examination, should be allowed to proceed so that it can be further considered. As the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) said, these matters could then be thrashed out in much greater detail.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): In opposing the carry-over motion, I shall refer at a little length to the document provided for us by the Cardiff Bay development corporation and the South Glamorgan county council, which we found in yesterday's post. It is part of the preparation for the debate. In a well-presented folder there are set out the arguments why we should be prepared to support the motion and allow the debate to continue on the Bill. Unfortunately, from the point of view of the promoters, having read the brochure produced by the development corporation and the county council, I have not been persuaded to change my view about the need for a barrage to be constructed to ensure a successful development of the Cardiff bay area.

The debate on the need for a carry-over motion to enable us further to consider the Bill is closely related to the type of development which needs to take place in Cardiff, and I am still of the view that there can be successful redevelopment of the bay area without the barrage being built. I remain convinced, therefore, that I should oppose the carry-over motion.

I shall refer briefly to the cogent arguments advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on the public expenditure considerations of the barrage. Perhaps I should remind him that it was that incomparable popular singer, Shirley Bassey, who made a great name for herself with a song, among others, entitled "Hey Big Spender". Shirley Bassey comes from Tiger bay, which is part of the area that will be the beneficiary of all the public expenditure. It is—[Interruption.] I hear from sounds off that Shirley Bassey came from Splott. That may be the precise area from which she came, but everyone in the world associates her with Tiger bay first, second and third. We are entering into some procedural, academic and semantic niceties by referring to Splott, but it will benefit from the redevelopment of the south Cardiff area.

Mr. Flynn: I do not wish to bring about a feeling of deja vu by repeating my previous performances when considering this Bill—other hon. Members have not shown the same restraint—but to suggest that Splott and Tiger bay are really one and the same place is an affront. It is as dangerous as saying that Upper Cwmtwrch and Lower Cwmtwrch are one and the same place. Shirley Bassey hails from the splendid Portmanmoor road, and she would be greatly insulted if it were suggested that she came from Tiger bay, which is a different part of Cardiff altogether.

Mr. Griffiths: I should hate to go into all the arguments. I am sure that you will agree, Madam Deputy Speaker, that according to popular mythology, which is important, Shirley Bassey hails from Tiger bay.

As a student at Cardiff university I lived in Habershon street, which is not far from Portmanmoor road, and can therefore attest to the need to redevelop the area. However, the question is whether the barrage is essential to the prosperous and successful redevelopment of Cardiff. I believe that it is not essential.

Some of the arguments advanced in the brochure, ignoring the economic case, given even more reason to oppose the motion. Once again, my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney did us a good service in revealing much of the associated cost of the development and mentioned a figure of about £500 million. The Minister, who for the time being at least has an interest in Cardiff as he is the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central, said that the figure is now about £335 million. Even if we accept that figure, it is much more than the £125·55 million quoted in the brochure, which attempts to outline the reasons why the barrage should be allowed.

Mr. Grist: The hon. Gentleman is probably muddling the figure of £335 million with the figure of £125·55 million for the barrage. The figure of £335 million includes the PDR expenditure.

Mr. Griffiths: I am grateful to the Minister for pointing that out, but the barrage is the contentious part of the total scheme for the redevelopment of south Cardiff. We doubt whether all the additional expenditure will be worthwhile for the Welsh economy. No doubt there will be spin offs for the economy of south Wales in the redevelopment of south Cardiff, but we are saying that the money provided for the barrage could be better spent in other parts of south Wales.

I want to draw the House's attention to two pages in the brochure, one entitled "Prevention of Flooding" and the other "Bay Water Quality". The section on prevention of flooding states:

"There will be a lower risk of flooding in Cardiff when the Barrage is built."

Good.

"The Barrage will keep out the very high tides, and at high tide the Barrage will provide adequate storage for river flood waters until low tide allows the sluices to be opened and the water drained off."

Good.

"Co-operation between the Development Corporation and all public bodies concerned with flood prevention is built into the Bill."

Good.

"As the flood protection authority (the National Rivers Authority) says, 'the Barrage will not reduce the level of protection provided by existing flood defences and may create a worthwhile improvement.'"

Good.

If we accept the word of the National Rivers Authority, the building of the barrage will help prevent flooding in south Cardiff. I certainly hope that that will be so, and it is good that that hope is buttressed by the authority and scientific knowledge of the National Rivers Authority.

Mr. Morgan: That view is totally contradicted by the Cardiff Bay development corporation's consultants, Wallace Evans and Partners. In their May 1988 report, they wrote:

"The results demonstrate that draining down the impounded bay before the arrival of a peak flood does not produce any real benefit for the high discharge event. This is because the bulk of the flood volume around the peak is far greater than the storage volume being made available."

Mr. Griffiths: I thank my hon. Friend for pointing that out. I was aware of the dispute about the evidence, but at least we had the authoritative statement by the National Rivers Authority that the barrage would be helpful in preventing flooding.

Mr. Michael: The NRA's authoritative statement is useful, but the evidence to the Committee and elsewhere shows that this is not a matter of dispute. It has been investigated and cleared out of the way, and hon. Members can have full confidence about it.

Mr. Griffiths: Once again, I thank my hon. Friend for trying to enlighten me. I accept that a dispute still exists, but for the sake of my argument I am happy to accept the NRA's statement about the prevention of flooding.

The page entitled "Bay Water Quality" states:

"The new freshwater lake will be fed by the Taff and Ely rivers and water will flow out through the Barrage. While not tidal, a continuous management programme will see to the removal of debris and algae that may accumulate on the shores and on the surface of the lake."

Good.

"Special equipment will keep the lake water oxygenated when river flows are very low. Today, salmon breed again in the Taff river after many years absence, a sure sign of improving water quality."

Good.

"Diversion of 14 main sewers will remove a major source of pollution. Standards set by the National Rivers Authority and effective control of industrial pollution will further improve the quality of water in the lake and thus make possible a greater range of water-related activities in the future."

Good.

"A management company, fully accountable to the Development Corporation, will manage the Barrage and the Bay and water quality in the lake. It will be funded from income generated by a property portfolio and without recourse to local authority funds."

Good.

Let us look at some of those statements. The NRA is directly quoted to substantiate the argument that the barrage will help to prevent flooding, but although reference is made to the NRA on the subject of water quality, there is no positive statement from that independent organisation that building the barrage will result in a satisfactory water environment. I believe that the NRA has ruled out the possibility of water contact sports because of the dangers for people who may fall into the water when participating in them.

Mr. Michael: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend by saying that that applies to many other inland waters, both natural and artificial. A case in point is Roth park lake, which is greatly valued even though the water quality is not marvellous. I invite my hon. Friend to consider the water in Bute east dock, which comes from the same source as will the water behind the barrage and which is already greatly appreciated by the general public in Cardiff.

Mr. Griffiths: My hon. Friend wants to put up the best case that he can for the barrage and the lake, but, as I understand it, the water behind the barrage will be completely different in nature from that which is now held in the docks. The building of the barrage will change the whole water regime in the Cardiff bay area. That is why there is such a big difference and one cannot compare what happens in Cardiff docks at present with the state of play that will pertain after the barrage is built. I find it most disturbing that, on the issue of bay water quality, the promoters did not see fit to get the National Rivers Authority to make a positive statement about the safety of the water and the freedom from pollution and other possible dangers that could be attendant on the management of the water behind the barrage.

My other major concern about the management of the quality of the water behind the barrage would not arise so much at times of low water. One can have water oxygenation equipment and we know that, in many parts of the world, it represents an extremely successful way of keeping the water healthy for the forms of life to be found in it. But I foresee a major difficulty arising at times when the river Taff is in spate. It is all very well to talk about the diversion of 14 main sewers but that is nothing like the number of sewers that pour into the Taff and Ely rivers at times of severe flooding, which happens very frequently in Wales during the winter months. We are famous for our rainfall. The rivers Taff and Ely readily flood, and the fact that the bay water quality leaflet makes no real mention of how to deal with water quality problems when the rivers are in flood is a major obstacle to our accepting the carry-over motion.

There is one further reason why I remain firmly convinced that we should not accept the carry-over motion —it has to do with the groundwater issue. The Minister referred to that and said that amendments had been made in Committee. He explained that further studies would be made in the light of which the Welsh Office would make a decision. Unfortunately, the end result of those studies could still be controversy. I do not think that it would be fair to place such a burden of responsibility on any Minister at the Welsh Office, especially given the high degree of commitment that the Welsh Office has to the barrage and to the present proposals for the development of Cardiff bay.

If we consider the groundwater issue, as outlined in this leaflet, which is designed to convince us that the correct thing to do would be to go along with the carry-over motion, we learn:

"The water impounded by the Barrage will raise the groundwater level in south and central Cardiff, which the Promoters have always recognised could affect some basements."

As I understand it, it took a lot of persuasion to get them to that position. Nevertheless, finally and because of the weight of the argument, they were persuaded to take account of this issue. In the beginning, however, the promoters tended to dismiss such arguments and only after seeing the weight of the evidence did they begin to accept that they would have to do something about the matter.

The leaflet also states:

"Independent experts commissioned by the Promoters say that this will not cause structural damage"—

hooray—

"cellars may become damp or at worst wet—but groundwater experts say that most properties will be unaffected."

There is a nice diagram to illustrate that point, but it does not convince me.

We are then told:

"Under the Bill there will be a comprehensive protection system for residents. The Bay management must survey properties within an agreed 'Protected Property Line' and undertake remedial action at no cost to occupiers. The protection will last for 20 years from the time of remedial work. The Development Corporation will initiate the general surveys and there will be a detailed code of practice to safeguard householders' rights.

Surveys will be undertaken over a wide area and will ensure that no property is without protection. It is estimated that only about 1,600 properties may require work and residents will have free access to an independent Complaints Administrator.

Residents outside the 'Protected Property Line' will also be fully safeguarded by the provisions of the Bill."

But why are they not dealt with in the same way as those within the protected property line?

We are then told—this might be looked on as a comfort to sustain the argument for the carry-over—that

"More computer modelling work on groundwater aspects is already underway to cover points of concern in the Petitioners' evidence. This will be reported to the Secretary of State and will be taken into account in his decision."

Yes, but that is the crux of the whole way in which the Cardiff bay barrage and the Bill intended to enable it to go ahead have been examined. We are running before we can walk. We are putting the cart before the horse.

Mr. Flynn: My hon. Friend must accept that the last time we discussed this matter he was one of the few who showed a detailed knowledge of the environmental reports that had been made. My hon. Friend is not doing himself justice tonight by quoting a weak summary of the argument when he knows that a great deal of respectable scientific work has been carried out. The collection of headings and generalisations to which he refers are untrue.

Mr. Griffiths: I am conscious, Madam Deputy Speaker, that we do not want to detain the House——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): What I am conscious of is that we are dealing with a carry-over motion to which I hope the hon. Gentleman will refer from time to time and that he will not get carried away with the general argument.

Mr. Griffiths: I have been trying to keep that at the forefront of my mind, Madam Deputy Speaker, all evening.

Madam Deputy Speaker: You could have fooled me.

Mr. Griffiths: The trouble is that interventions often cause me to go down the wrong track.

If I can be allowed to carry on with what I want to say, my answer to the very important point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Flynn) is that I do not dispute the fact that a number of studies have been carried out—some are still being carried out—on the groundwater aspects of the building of the Cardiff bay barrage. I contend that it is inappropriate for us to be discussing the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill and the carry-over motion that will enable the Bill to continue on its course through the House while the studies are incomplete.

The most important point of all is that the people who could be affected by the rising groundwater should know the results of all the surveys before we give the Bill further consideration. We can have differences of opinion about the importance or otherwise of the sites of special scientific interest, but we cannot have a difference of opinion about the fact that the barrage should not go ahead until all the studies are completed and available for our inspection. We should not allow the studies to go on and then let the Welsh Office decide once they are completed. That would place the Welsh Office in an invidious position. It has already made it clear this evening that it fully supports the barrage. If there is still contention about the effects of the groundwater after the studies are completed, it would be wrong to let the Welsh Office decide. That is why I hope that the House will reject the carry-over motion.

12.6 am

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): As you have said, Madam Deputy Speaker, the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) went into detailed arguments about different parts of the Bill. Like the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), he discussed the economic case. Indeed, the hon. Member for

[Mr. Gwilym Jones]

Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney concentrated upon it entirely. I believe that both hon. Gentlemen made the case for the motion.

Within the narrow confines of what we can properly debate on this motion we cannot resolve these detailed economic matters or some of the other points that have been mentioned. The logical outcome of passing the motion would be to allow the Bill to go forward to Report stage, when all these points can be properly dealt with, all the detail can be examined and, I hope, when all hon. Members can be satisfied, at least as far as that is possible. These matters should be discussed on Report, not in a debate on this motion.

I shall try to remain within the limits of the motion and not be called to order. I want to respond briefly to the lengthy contribution made by the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies). I shall not discuss the minor part of his speech dealing with the environment, because I have a healthy appreciation of his concern for environmental matters; but the major part of his speech was about the backing for the Bill. He went so far as to misrepresent the fact that seldom has there been a Bill that enjoys such overwhelming support in South Glamorgan.

Four of the five Members who represent South Glamorgan strongly support the barrage Bill. Many councillors in the Cardiff city, South Glamorgan and Vale of Glamorgan councils support the Bill. More than 80 per cent. of councillors in the area support it—a good demonstration of the support among the tiers of elected representatives in the area.

Support for the Bill is not confined to one political party. The Labour party controls South Glamorgan council, the Conservatives control the Vale of Glamorgan council and Cardiff city council is a hung council. Both major parties in Cardiff strongly support the Bill.

Mr. Morgan: I think that the hon. Gentleman may be misleading the House. If he means that Labour councillors support the project he may well be right, but he is not right if he means that the Labour party supports the project. Four of the five general management committees of the Labour party are against the barrage. [Interruption.] I am not sure what my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), who is sitting behind me, is trying to say. In the last 12 months those general management committees in South Glamorgan have voted against the barrage by majorities of 2:1, 3:1, 4:1 and 5:1.

Mr. Jones: I hope that I am not misleading the House. I cannot speak well about Labour party management committees, but the sotto voce comment from behind the hon. Gentleman suggested that he might well have been misleading the House. In every respect it must be true to say that all elected representatives from the major parties are in favour. Perhaps the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) would like to contribute to the debate because I understand that the minor party, the Liberal party, on Cardiff city council and in South Glamorgan is very much in favour of the Bill. I urge the House to support the motion.

I appreciate the built-in frustration of debating a private Bill. That has been well covered. However, for the moment it is the only way for us to consider the matter and it has resulted in long and exhaustive consideration. In its way such a Bill is no different from other Bills. Earlier, we debated the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill and a great raft of mainly Government amendments went through in a short time. It is naive for anyone to expect a Bill to emerge unchanged at the end of the parliamentary process. Such a Bill would be a minor one. Bills are made better by amendments.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jones: I hope to be brief but I had better give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Griffiths: I would not expect the Bill to remain unamended. One of my major points was that such a contentious issue as groundwater should be settled before the Bill is debated. That is my objection to the motion.

Mr. Jones: How can we make progress without accepting the motion? The matters that worry the hon. Gentleman can be moved forward and debated at another stage.

The Bill has been improved by the consideration that it has already had. The fact that we are discussing an exceptional measure fully justifies the basic principle of a carry-over motion. The Bill is exceptional because of what it will achieve. It will lead to the redevelopment of south Cardiff and new jobs and homes and will be a tremendous boost to our economy and to the capital city of Wales. Of course, that is already happening, because Cardiff is talked about far and wide. However, the benefits from the Bill will extend to a wider area. It would be a tragedy if the motion were defeated and the Bill were lost.

There has already been a substantial investment in the Bill of time, money and activity. Many people, such as hon. Members, the two councils, the development corporation and others have made that investment. It has not been mentioned so I shall put on record our thanks to the four members of the Select Committee who spent 26 or 27 painstaking days going through the Bill. They were my hon. Friends the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks), and for Keighley (Mr. Waller) and the hon. Members for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) and for Doncaster, North (Mr. Welsh). We owe all of them a debt of gratitude.

That Committee was quite innovative. I think that it was the first time that a Committee has taken evidence outside the House on the matter. Certainly, it must have been the first time that a Committee took evidence in song on it. It would be a tragedy if all that hard work and exceptional consideration were lost. Not least, it would be tragic in view of all that has been done to resolve the reasonable doubts in south Wales. Contrary to what was said by the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) my impression of south Wales is that opposition to the Bill is fast receding. From what I read of the front-page headlines in South Gamorgan, opposition in the Labour party there is receding. The greatest attempts are being made to resolve all the legitimate concerns. All along, those who have wanted to promote this scheme have appreciated the concerns, and all involved have been doing all that they can to help those who are worried that they might be disadvantaged by what happens if the Bill is passed.

I noticed recently that the city council gave money to the Cardiff flood action committee, not because it agreed with the position that the committee had taken but in the spirit of trying to help those who are worried by the Bill. That same spirit has been shown by everyone, particularly the officials of the two councils and the development corporation.

If we were to carry on with the detailed arguments, we should not achieve the real purpose of the motion. The only way to resolve the detailed arguments is to agree to the motion so that we can have further debates. Not to resolve it in that way would be the greatest tragedy for south Wales.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I wholeheartedly agree with the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) and others about the sad passing away of Councillor John Reynolds, who was the Labour leader on Cardiff city council and who served as a member of the board of the Cardiff Bay development corporation. The very first job that I ever had was as a tutor-organiser with the south Wales district of the Workers Educational Association. I was told that my job was to go out and find more John Reynolds. He had been a booking clerk, and he went on to make a major contribution first to education and then to the public service, serving on the city council for several decades. For the two years that I was with the WEA, I tried to find more such people, before handing my job on to others who are far better known in public life and politics.

I ask the House to sink this barrage before it sinks half my consituency.

Mr. Flynn: That is a wild exaggeration.

Mr. Morgan: I feared that there might be a sedentary comment from the back row in response to that, although I am not sure what the definition of wild exaggeration might be. Anybody who thinks that that is a wild exaggeration should turn to the evidence presented to the Select Committee on this point. Earlier, we had the presence of the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), but there are no members of the Committee present now, so I had better read the evidence of a witness expert in groundwater computer modelling, which is a way to predict what would happen after a barrage was built. This is relevant to whether we should agree to the carry-over motion.

The House will have to allow for the elision in the banter between the witness and the Chairman in these questions and answers. The Chairman asked:

"Thousands of people will suffer from groundwater problems if the model is wrong?"

Dr. Miles, the witness, said:

"Yes, and rather than enhancing Cardiff, it would turn it into a laughing stock; this is the city that turned itself into a swamp—how would that look in the papers?"

Later, the Chairman asked:

"'Urban swamp' was your own phrase. I tried to rhyme 'Miles' with 'urban swamp'"—

this is the banter—

"and I failed to come up with something, I must confess!"

Dr. Miles, having done the donkey work necessary to make an accurate prediction, within the best parameters, using the best technology in computer modelling and accurate field work when collecting the data that goes into the computer model, predicted that the barrage would present a serious danger of turning the low-lying areas of Cardiff into an urban swamp. That is the risk that I am being asked to take on behalf of my constituents.

I take the matter seriously because we are being asked to pass a carry-over motion even though the studies are not yet complete. It is obvious from the debate that this is a unique motion. We are being asked to approve, on behalf of our constituents, a pig-in-a-poke.

The technical studies were demanded by a majority of the Select Committee. One member wanted to throw it out, but the other three agreed that, procedurally, the Bill should come this far, even though they did not think that it was proper for the barrage to be built. From what the Minister said earlier, we will not know the results of the studies for another 18 months. We are being asked to continue the life of the Bill even though that is irrelevant because the actual decision will be made not by Parliament, with most unusually restricted rights for petitioners and objectors, but by the Secretary of State for Wales after he has had written representations and has consulted his new expert from the centre for irrigation studies at Southampton university.

As far as I am aware, never before have we been asked to approve a Bill that is subject to the Secretary of State having the last word. It is like the Select Committee saying that it did not really think it safe to proceed with the barrage, but it did not want to kill the Bill. We are being told, "Bear with us, take it all on trust and the Secretary of State will play a fair-minded, neutral, quasi-judicial planning role when he makes up his mind in 18 months."

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is my hon. Friend aware that next year could be election year? If so, the carry-over motion means that we will be discussing the Bill in election year. What happens in an election year? The Government start Bills but do not finish them. The Prime Minister will be deciding the date of the election, she will be looking for that window of opportunity, she will be fiddling every set of statistics that she can, she will not know whether she is coming or going, the ERM will go sour, and in the middle of all that someone will say to her, "Do you know, Prime Minister, that we have not yet finished the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill?" What is she likely to say in the middle of all that? It will be, "Stuff the Bill", or something like that. She will not come here in her carpet slippers at 10 or 12 o'clock at night to vote for the Bill. She will have other fish to fry.

I am hoping to speak in the debate about the electoral consequences of the Bill. In some circumstances, they could be helpful to the Labour party. I am looking at it from both angles. Has my hon. Friend examined it from a wider political view?

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has given us yet further proof that he is not thinking of crossing the Floor.

It is quite likely that there will have been an election before the results of the further inquiries are known, yet we are being asked to pass a carry-over motion tonight.

We must consider the alternatives if the motion is refused. The promoters of the barrage could return when they have finished their studies. They could then say that they have used the best technology available and the best computer modelling experts, and then give their prediction for the level of groundwater in the affected low-lying areas of the three constituencies concerned. We will then know the price of the barrage; tonight, we are being asked to buy a pig-in-a-poke.

The groundwater issue is of concern to my constituency. Obviously, it also affects the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth. The barrage will be in his constituency, but water does not respect parliamentary boundaries. On the other side of the River Taff, it will also affect the highly marginal constituency of the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist). In terms of residential areas, my constituency will be most affected. Roughly 40 per cent. of them fall within my constituency, 35 per cent. within the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth and 20 per cent. within Cardiff, Central, the Under-Secretary of State's constituency. The barrage will have an effect in those areas.

If the mouths of the Taff and the Ely are impounded, the resulting lake may be in my hon. Friend's constituency, but two fingers of it will extend into my constituency and that of the Minister. But the water under the surface, residentially speaking, affects my constituency more than any other, so I am very concerned about it.

Mr. Skinner: Residentially speaking?

Mr. Morgan: I do not know whether my hon. Friend remembers his days underground.

Mr. Skinner: Yes.

Mr. Morgan: He would have been extremely conscious of water under the ground. Water beneath one's house is as important as water flooding a coal mine. I do not want my constituents to live in the equivalent of a flooded coal mine.

Since about 7.30 this evening I have been in a position to present some new evidence to the House on that very issue. It is pretty sensational because it cuts completely across the assurances given in the wonderful pop-up birthday card sent to all Members of Parliament by Cardiff Bay development corporation, at great public expense, and about as factual as one.

The information that I want to give to the House is the result of the fieldwork carried out by——

Ordered,

That the Promoters of the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill [Lords] shall have leave to suspend proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bill, if they think fit, in the next Session of Parliament, provided that the Agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office of their intention to suspend further proceedings not later than the day before the close of the present Session and that all Fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid;

Ordered,

That, if the Bill is brought from the Lords in the next Session, the Agents for the Bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration signed by them, stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill which was brought from the Lords in the present Session;

Ordered,

That as soon as a certificate by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office, that such a declaration has been so deposited, has been laid upon the Table of the House, the Bill shall be read the first and second time and committed (and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read and committed) and shall be committed to the Chairman of Ways and Means, who shall make such Amendments thereto as have been made by the Committee in the present Session, and shall report the Bill as amended in the House forthwith, and the Bill, so amended, shall be ordered to lie upon the Table;

Ordered,

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

Ordered,

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.

PROCEDURE

Motion made,

That this House agrees with the recommendations contained in the First Report of the Select Committee on Procedure of this Session (House of Commons Paper No. 379).—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

Hon. Members: Object.

QUESTIONS TO MEMBERS, ETC.

Motion made,

That with effect from the beginning of the next Session of Parliament Standing Order No. 17 (Questions to Members) and Standing Order No. 18 (Notices of motions, amendments and questions) be repealed and the following Standing Orders be made—

Time for taking questions

(1)—Questions shall be taken on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, after private business has been disposed of.

(2) No question shall be taken after half-past three o'clock, except questions which have not appeared on the paper but which are in Mr. Speaker's opinion of an urgent character and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business.

(3) Any questions tabled for written answer on a day on which the House does not sit by reason of the continuance of a previous sitting shall be deemed to be questions for written answer on the next sitting day and shall appear on the Order Paper for that day.

Notices of questions, motions and amendments

(1)—Notices of questions shall be given by Members in writing to the Table Office.

(2) A notice of a question, or of an amendment to a motion standing on the Order Paper for which no day has been fixed or of the addition of a name in support of such a motion or amendment, which is given after half-past ten o'clock in the evening shall be treated for all purposes as if it were a notice handed in after the rising of the House.

(3) A Member shall indicate on the notice of any question whether it is for oral, written or priority written answer.

(4) Where a Member has indicated that a question is for priority written answer the Minister shall cause an answer to be given to the Member on the date for which notice has been given, provided that the requirement of notice shall be the same for such questions as that prescribed in this order for questions for oral answer.

(5) Notice of a question for oral answer may not be given on a day earlier than ten sitting days before the day for answer, provided that, where that earliest day would otherwise fall on a Friday, the earliest day on which such notice may be given will instead be the previous sitting day.

(6) Notice of any question for oral answer must appear at latest on the notice paper circulated two days (excluding Saturday and Sunday) before that on which an answer is desired.

(7) When it is proposed that the House shall adjourn for a period of less than four days, any day during that period (other than a Saturday or Sunday) shall be counted as a sitting day for the purpose of calculating the period in paragraph (5) of this order.

(8) When notice shall have been given of a Motion for the adjournment of the House for more than three days Mr. Speaker may cause to have printed and circulated with the Vote a memorandum superseding the provisions of paragraphs (5) and (6) of this order and instead setting out the earliest day on which notice of questions for oral answer may be given for each of the first ten sitting days after that adjournment, provided that each such day shall as far as practicable fall on the same day of the week as that on which the question is to be answered and shall not be fewer than fourteen days before the day for answer; and also setting out the latest day for notice of questions for oral answer on each of the first two sitting days following that adjournment provided that each such day shall not be fewer than two days (excluding Saturday and Sunday) before the day for answer. —[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

Hon. Members: Object.

Portsmouth Naval Base

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

12.51 am

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): The debate arises from the present and latest consideration within the Ministry of Defence of the future of the fleet maintenance and repair organisation in Portsmouth dockyard, which is crucial to the future of the dockyard. It follows upon a letter which I received in September from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement, who is making tonight his first appearance at the Government Dispatch Box since taking up his ministerial duties in July, and whom I welcome wholeheartedly.

With about half of all naval personnel and their families living in Portsmouth, or within its immediate area, the considerations generated by the debate cannot be confined merely to the naval base. Its future has profound implications for the future scope and effectiveness of the Royal Navy itself. We must never forget that the Royal Navy is the world's third largest as an effective fighting force, and I want it to remain so.

The people of Portsmouth—above all, the debate is about people—have grown used over the centuries to cuts in times of peace and to expansion in war. There is a deep understanding of such necessities. These are timely considerations in the present Gulf crisis. In the euphoria of the aftermath of events in the Soviet Union and eastern Europe, there was much talk of a peace dividend, of making huge cuts in our armed forces, including a drastic reduction of ships in the Royal Navy. I did not share that judgment, and to his everlasting credit nor did my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. I asked him during the most recent defence questions on 17 July whether he agreed with me

"that it would be criminal folly to reduce our defences, including nuclear weapons, to a lower level than any eventuality, however unforeseeable, might demand?"—[Official Report, 17 July 1990; Vol. 176, c. 847.]

My right hon. Friend's reply, and subsequent remarks in the "options for change" statement a week later, were encouraging.

The events of 2 August and subsequently in the Gulf wholly vindicate such an approach. Many of our ships are serving in the Gulf and more are likely to be needed. Thank goodness for the Royal Navy and for Portsmouth dockyard and those who serve it so well. The present investigation into the future management of the FMRO identifies several options, depending on several assumptions. I have not the time to explore them all. No one expects the present arrangements to continue indefinitely. Change is expected, and positive change will be welcome.

Before dealing with the options, I want to underline the importance of my hon. Friend reaching a swift decision. An interim report is sought from the consultants by 14 December, with a final report in February 1991. I suspect that the December report will be the vital one on which irrevocable decisions will be made. Apart from docking and essential maintenance work, the type 42 refit stream is being kept employed on HMS Nottingham, with a planned finish in August 1991. At that time, the FMRO was expecting HMS Manchester, but Plymouth's needs appear to be winning that order.

Portsmouth will suffer grievously from indecision and I urge my hon. Friend not to permit it. Whatever the structure of management, we need a continuous programme of work to keep the strengths of the FMRO together and the morale and confidence of its work force assured.

The options include privatisation and the introduction of commercial arrangements similar to Plymouth. However, the option I wish to be adopted, which I wish to concentrate on as the positive option, is the introduction of a defence support agency with a trading fund. That would assume a core programme of docking and essential defects on ships based at Portsmouth. Such an option keeps military control and the prized integration of service and civilian personnel which I referred to in my maiden speech almost exactly three years ago and which has been working so effectively since 1984. That integration also provides the best safeguard against industrial action.

Such an option would, in addition, give an undisputed yardstick for comparing costs so that the FMRO can compete fairly in the marketplace through tendering for naval refits or any other suitable work such as cross channel ferry maintenance and repair, rather than risking it going to French yards. Had such a structure been in place last year, we probably would not have lost the type 42 HMS Southampton repair and refit, which was a great blow at the time. Such a structure would keep in being the apprenticeships, of which there are 125 at present and 32 a year, which provide vital opportunities for young people in the work force.

The alternative to that option, which is the worst and most unacceptable of all, is a bollards and fenders option —in effect, closing down the existing FMRO, selling off the greater part of the dockyard and using what is left as a parking lot for ships, with all necessary work being contracted for and usually to be carried out at a great distance from Portsmouth.

To pursue such an option, or any other tantamount to it, would be foolhardy in the extreme for several reasons. Of the three dockyards—Portsmouth, Plymouth and Rosyth—Portsmouth is the most sensible in which to concentrate work on ships. It would be wise to increase the number of ships based there, and there is space. The policies of harmony, Slimtrain and others have for many years led to the highest concentration of people, ships with home base and training bases in Portsmouth and its area. Apart from the naval base, including HMS Nelson and Gunwharf—I press as strongly as possible for the special clearance diving unit to remain there—there is Collingwood, Whale island, which is soon to have the addition of Phoenix, Sultan, Dryad and Mercury, which is being transferred to Collingwood.

That is why I referred earlier to approximately half of all royal naval personnel and families living in Portsmouth or near to it. To reverse such policies would lead to excessive separation and the loss of good men and women, would risk personal morale and would have a serious effect on recruitment. It would be incomprehensible to many serving in the Royal Navy, let alone the people of the city of Portsmouth.

The city, as my hon. Friend is well aware, has coped magnificently with previous large reductions in the work force, which is reliant on the dockyard. A heritage area has grown up around HMS Victory and the royal naval museum, which comprises the Mary Rose and Warrior. Massive new investment is planned there. A thriving ferry port has increased in strength and importance, but to pursue any option that neuters the naval base, the core of the royal naval presence in Portsmouth, would be to sacrifice centuries of the closest and most fruitful relationship between the city and the Royal Navy, to the damage of both.

This brings me to the third and final strand of the debate. It concerns Navy days. Practically everybody in the United Kingdom is aware of Portsmouth's Navy days. For many visitors in late August, that is why they come to Portsmouth. They and those who live in the area produced an attendance of about 70,000 at Navy days this year. Navy days began in Portsmouth and are a veritable showcase of the Royal Navy. They make a sizeable profit every year, even after allowing for the greatly increased costs of security arrangements. This year, the net profit was £106,000, which was shared between various naval charities, chief among them the King George V Fund for Sailors. By contrast, Plymouth-Devonport attracted merely 23,000 visitors to its Navy days and made a net profit of £15,000.

It is rumoured that we are to lose our annual Navy days, to alternate them with Plymouth. I cannot understand why successful Portsmouth should suffer for the deficiencies of Plymouth as a magnet; nor can my constituents. It is not just a question of having an aircraft carrier to inspect. Portsmouth has many other related attractions. It is highly successful; it is not remote; and it is central, with an enormous catchment area.

Annual Navy days are a vital catalyst of interest in naval affairs by the public which has contributed to the special affection in which the Royal Navy is held. Portsmouth is inextricably linked with that feeling. The contribution of our Navy days to recruitment over the years should never be underestimated. This unique throwing open of the gates should be retained every year. There is no sense, operationally or financially, in jettisoning such a successful and profitable—particularly for charities—annual occasion.

I should like to draw together the strands of the matters that I have raised. The presence of the Royal Navy in Portsmouth and the surrounding area, with its core at the naval base, is above all about people who are proud of its service and traditions. Napoleons, Kaisers, Hitlers, Galtieris and Husseins are always popping up in one guise or another. That is understood in Portsmouth as nowhere else in Britain in greater measure.

In Portsmouth, generation after generation of citizens and families have crammed the ancient battlements, crowded the shores or massed at the entrance to one of the greatest harbours in the world to mingle their tears, cheers, enthusiasm and profound respect in seeing off or welcoming home the men who do their duty in fighting our battles, in risking life and well-being for the preservation of our freedoms. That is the very lifeblood and spirit of Portsmouth. It will never be dated, and it will never be redundant.

1.2 am

The Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Kenneth Carlisle): I am delighted to be able to reply to the debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Martin), partly because he has been kind enough to give me the opportunity to make my debut at the Dispatch Box but chiefly because it gives me the opportunity to discuss Her Majesty's naval base at Portsmouth.

[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle]

My hon. Friend is a staunch fighter for his constituency. In my short time at the Ministry of Defence, he has already made known to me several times his concern about Portsmouth. I know that I shall become used to his vigour in the months ahead. I sense from his speech his pride for his town and his determination to protect it. As he advised me, Portsmouth has a long and distinguished naval history. As long ago as the reign of King Henry VII, the first real dry dock and yard were built just outside the town. Henry VII built up a fleet in the face of the threat from France and chose Portsmouth for his dockyard and naval base. This progress was consolidated over the next 150 years and, by the end of the 17th century, Portsmouth was recognised as the chief naval centre of England. Its distinguished naval tradition continued for the next two centuries and capital warships were built there until the end of the first world war.

More recently, the Falklands war in 1982 saw the same degree of dedication from Portsmouth that we had learnt to expect in previous wars. HMS Hermes sailed for the South Atlantic on 5 April 1982 from Portsmouth and became the flagship of the task force, which was to grow into the largest fleet to sail from the shores of Britain since world war 2. Portsmouth also converted more ships taken up from trade than any other yard—21 in all. Again, Portsmouith met the challenge with its traditional spirit.

My hon. Friend represents a constituency with a unique and proud naval tradition, but he knows that history shows that the needs of the armed forces change over time. For example, the defence review of 1981 identified the need to reorganise defence efforts to obtain the best return from the defence budget. As a result, the role of Portsmouth dockyard was changed in March 1984 when it became the fleet maintenance and repair organisation, or FMRO as it is habitually known.

My hon. Friend has raised a number of important points and I should now like to deal more specifically with them. As the declaration at the London NATO summit in July recognised, Europe has entered a new and more promising era to which the alliance must and will adapt. As my hon. Friend knows, in the light of these developments, the United Kingdom, along with its major NATO allies, has been conducting a thorough review of the way in which our armed forces might be restructured in the mid 1990s.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced the broad thrust of the proposals that we had under consideration for our own armed forces in his announcement to the House on "Options for Change" on 25 July. My hon. Friend said that he understood the need for that statement, and expressed his general support for it.

In announcing the proposals for changes in our force structures, the Secretary of State also made it clear that we would be looking for substantial savings in the support area. As I am sure my hon. Friend would agree, if we are to achieve our aim of strong and reliable forces but at a lower level and at an affordable cost, we must carry out the most rigorous and wide-ranging examination of all our activities and resources in the support area to ensure that we are providing that support in the most effective and cheapest way. However, as my hon. Friend knows, many complex and inter-related factors impinge on the way forward and require proper evaluation. It is still far too early for any decisions to have been reached as a result of this continuing work.

In parallel with and as an input to our work on "Options for Change", as my hon. Friend knows, we are undertaking a study looking into the future of the FMRO. The study has a long pedigree. I do not want to burden the House with a lengthy account, but I think that it is important to record the background against which we find ourselves needing to review our ship refitting capacity generally, and the Portsmouth capacity in particular.

Since the introduction of commercial management at Devonport and Rosyth in 1987, there has been a steady decline in the core programme of refits allocated to those yards. The decline has been faster and to a lower level than expected before vesting day when the term contracts were negotiated with Devonport Management Limited, or DML and Babcock Thorn Limited, or BTL. Devonport, with a higher proportion of surface ship work, has seen a particularly sharp drop in load. More than 4,000 jobs have been shed by DML since vesting day in an attempt to keep productivity ahead of the declining load and compete for new business.

Equally, I acknowledge that Portsmouth endured a major reduction earlier in the 1980s when civilian jobs declined from 7,000 to under 3,000. Since then, however, the FMRO workload has been kept fairly constant while the load elsewhere has declined. The aim of the study is to examine the role of the FMRO in the light of the reduction in the overall fleet repair and maintenance task, given the need to secure value for money. As my hon. Friend knows, the study will be undertaken by external consultants.

I want to stress that no decisions have yet been taken on the future workload at Portsmouth. The consultants will be invited to recommend separate arrangements for each of three different workload scenarios. One is broadly the status quo; another is the status quo less the few refits currently in Portsmouth's programme, leaving the intermediate dockings, other routine maintenance periods and unprogrammed work intact; and the last is to leave only berthing facilities, with the ships docking elsewhere for deep repair or refitting.

It is necessary to study this wide range of workload alternatives so that the future of the FMRO can be better determined within the context of our wider work in the fleet support area on "Options for Change". The smaller fleet envisaged for the mid-1990s implies significant rationalisation of shore support. The FMRO study will therefore form a useful input into that broader study of our naval bases, dockyards and other support facilities. We hope to be in a position to make that input by the turn of the year. I understand what my hon. Friend said about speedy decisions and the need to avoid uncertainty as far as possible.

My hon. Friend also mentioned his wish for a defence support agency. As one of the alternatives, the study will also have to consider whether that status would be suitable for the FMRO.

I should like to follow my predecessors in paying tribute to the dedication and skill of the work force in the FMRO, both service and civilian, who have a record of which to be proud, not least in recent weeks as they have helped prepare the ships deployed to the Gulf on operation Granby. As I have said, this is service in the great tradition of Portsmouth, and we pay tribute to that, as my hon. Friend did so proudly.

My hon. Friend referred to the effects on the morale of the naval community of any decision to diminish or abandon the naval presence at Portsmouth. I understand that concern. As part of the continuing work on "Options for Change", and as part of the FMRO study, we shall take carefully into account issues related to morale. I regard that as particularly important. It is, however, as I have already emphasised, too early to make announcements since this work remains to be completed. The interests of the Portsmouth naval community, service and civilian, will of course be given careful weight before any decisions are taken. Of course, I understand the worries that any review creates, but we should be negligent if we did not look carefully at all the options before us.

My hon. Friend also expressed concern about the future of Portsmouth Navy days. He may find it helpful if I explain the current position. As he is certainly aware, Navy days are currently held each year at Portsmouth, Plymouth, Rosyth and Portland. We have, however, initiated a review of the present arrangements. Pending the outcome of the review, it is intended to introduce interim revised arrangements for Navy days in 1991. Under these revised arrangements, Rosyth and Portland would continue to host Navy days as at present, but major Navy days would alternate between Plymouth and Portsmouth every year. It is planned to hold that event in Plymouth in 1991. I know that that may well be a disappointment to my hon. Friend.

The principal reason behind the change is to concentrate assets at one major port each year so as to make more efficient use of available resources, and to ensure the best possible show for the public. It is far better to have one really good show than two shows with less panache and zest. I am sure my hon. Friend will understand that we need to strike an appropriate balance between the many competing demands on the fleet's ships and personnel. No decision on future arrangements beyond 1991 will be taken until after the review. I assure my hon. Friend, however, that we shall take full account of the popularity and value of Navy days at Portsmouth and at the other venues when reaching a decision.

I recognise and have taken note of the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend on behalf of Portsmouth naval base and its naval and civilian personnel. I assure him that we are very much alive to those concerns and that they will be given their due weight as we go forward with our examination of the infrastructure needed to support the fleet in the changing circumstances that have come upon us.

I said at the beginning of my speech that my hon. Friend is a doughty campaigner for Portsmouth. I respect his efforts and I welcome the opportunity to work closely with him over the months ahead. I certainly look forward very much to my forthcoming visit to Portsmouth.

Question put and agreed to.

That all Petitions relating to the Bill presented in the present Session which stand referred to the Committee on the Bill shall stand referred to the Committee on the Bill in the next Session;

That no Petitioners shall be heard before the Committee on the Bill, unless their Petition has been presented within the time limited within the present Session or deposited pursuant to paragraph (b) of Standing Order 126 relating to Private Business;

That, in relation to the Bill, Standing Order 127 relating to Private Business shall have effect as if the words "under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of petitions against Bill)" were omitted;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.—[The Chairman of Ways and Means.]

Hon. Members: Object.

To be considered on Wednesday 24 October at Seven o'clock.

SMITH KLINE & FRENCH LABORATORIES, AUSTRALIA, AND MENLEY & JAMES, AUSTRALIA BILL [LORDS]

Ordered,

That the Promoters of the Smith Kline & French Laboratories, Australia, and Menley & James, Australia Bill [Lords] shall have leave to suspend further proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bill, if they think fit, in the next Session of Parliament, provided that the Agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office of their intention to suspend further proceedings not later than the day before the close of the present Session and that all Fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid;

Ordered,

That if the Bill is brought from the Lords in the next Session, the Agents for the Bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration signed by them, stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill which was brought from the Lords in the present Session;

Ordered,

That as soon as a certificate by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office, that such a declaration has been so deposited, has been laid upon the Table of the House, the Bill shall be read the first and second time and committed (and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read and committed);

Ordered,

That no Petitions against the Bill having been presented within the time limited within the present Session, no Petitioners shall be heard before any Committee on the Bill save those who complain of any amendment as proposed in the filled up Bill or of any matters which arise during the progress of the Bill before the Committee;

Ordered,

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

Ordered,

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.—[The Chairman of Ways and Means.]

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bait Breeding

1. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received about bait breeding.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): My Department has been in regular contact with the British Bait Breeders Association and individual bait breeders about a European Community directive on the disposal of animal waste.

Mr. Canavan: Does the Minister recall writing to me in July and admitting that the then most recent draft of the European Community proposal would, on the face of it, prohibit bait breeding and therefore reduce the opportunity of many anglers to participate in their favourite sport? Has not the overcentralisation of the Common Market reached a ridulous stage when the Eurocrats are not only attempting to dictate the value of sterling but dictating to ordinary anglers what they can or cannot use to catch fish?

Mr. Curry: I am delighted to be able to tell the hon. Gentleman that the proposed directive now provides specifically for bait breeders to continue their activities unaltered. That is proof of the success of the Government's difficult negotiations in Brussels. As the hon. Gentleman said, this proposal will be welcomed by millions of British anglers who enjoy the most popular sport in this country.

Mr. Ron Davies: Will not the proposed directive pose particular problems for the British knacker industry? Can the Minister confirm that a considerable burden will be imposed on the British livestock industry and the British slaughtering industry if the directive goes through in its present form? Can he tell us precisely what action he intends to take to safeguard fundamental and vital British interests?

Mr. Curry: The directive was discussed again just two days ago in Luxemburg. As the hon. Gentleman said, the present draft is unsatisfactory in relation to knackers. It would require the trade to cease in 1995. We have said that that is unsatisfactory and have succeeded in getting the document referred for further discussion. We will do our best to get a provision for that trade to continue. I endorse the hon. Gentleman's comments about the importance of the trade, but I do not wish to mislead him by suggesting that it will be an easy battle. The system is unique to the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland and it will be extremely difficult to achieve its continuation, but we are determined to fight that battle to the best of our ability.

Pesticides

2. Dr. Marek: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the use of pesticides on agricultural land.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Maclean): The use of pesticides on land is tightly controlled under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985.

Dr. Marek: Does the Parliamentary Secretary accept that that glib statement is nowhere near good enough? Will he take a leaf out of the Minister's book and rely on scientific evidence, and take into careful consideration the British Medical Association's paper and its harsh criticism of the Ministry? Will he abandon his cheap jibes and admit that there is nothing wrong with natural food? Will he admit that what is required is a lessening of pesticides, especially in affected water catchment areas, and thorough consultation with everyone interested in the matter?

Mr. Maclean: There is nothing wrong with any food if it is treated properly. That applies both to natural food and to food that has been treated with pesticides. If the hon. Gentleman bothers to read the report on pesticide residues that we published a couple of weeks ago, he will see that we are among the best in Europe in having the lowest pesticide residues. On the BMA report, the House should be told—if the hon. Gentleman knows—why some of the few scientists on the committee dissociated themselves from part of the report or resigned from the committee. I note that some other members were representatives of or spokesmen for Friends of the Earth and one was one of Mr. Ron Todd's men.

Mr. Jopling: Is my hon. Friend aware that if he wants to restrict the use of pesticides on farm land, one of the quickest ways would be to make an urgent and substantial increase in environmentally sensitive areas, where the use of pesticides is restricted? At the same time, he would be doing something to help the most urgent and dramatic crisis that is hitting our upland areas, about which I hope that he will do something very soon.

Mr. Maclean: I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend for having the nous and good sense to introduce environmentally sensitive areas when he did. They are an outstanding achievement and we are committed to reviewing their success in the future. However, I must point out to my right hon. Friend that pesticide use in this country has declined since this Government came to power. We are proud of that achievement, and also of the fact that we stress optimum and best use of pesticides—not maximum use.

Mr. Hague: Does my hon. Friend agree that this country has some of the most stringent and intensive tests of pesticides and releases more data about them than most other countries do? Is not it in the best interests both of agriculture and of the environment to emphasise the need for the continued development of new pesticides which can be more selectively and effectively targeted?

Mr. Maclean: I was surprised to see that the BMA report, which I have here, calls for more information and less secrecy. Has no one told the BMA that we swept away the last vestiges of secrecy surrounding pesticide data when my right hon. Friend the Minister made his announcement a few months ago? The report also calls for regulation. Has no one told the BMA that regulation is now under some of the toughest statutory controls in the world, which were introduced in 1985?

Mr. Hardy: Will the Minister reconsider his rather intemperate reference to Friends of the Earth? Does he not accept that organisations such as Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace, while not adding to the comfort of the Government, have exposed many serious problems in the British environment?

Mr. Maclean: I should make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that I have a great deal of respect for the work of Friends of the Earth. I was merely making the point that we should not get the impression that the BMA report was produced by top academic experts. The committee contained people who were not medically qualified, but who were spokesmen for Friends of the Earth. That is perfectly legitimate, but let us not pretend that all those who produced the report were academic experts.

Dr. David Clark: Does the Minister appreciate that there is considerable public anxiety about pesticides, and that the anxiety is heightened by the BMA report? The Minister's complacent answer this afternoon did not help matters. Will he confirm that 41 per cent. of the pesticides currently in use were approved before 1966, and that even with the Government's speeded-up programme it will take a further 15 years to review those pesticides? Will he further confirm that it is currently taking an average of four years to get approvals for new pesticides and that firms such as ICI and Shell have had only one or zero approvals since they made their applications in 1986?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. He cannot complain about the time that it takes to review pesticides and simultaneously complain that because we and the companies making the pesticides are so thorough it takes a long time to develop a new pesticide. If there is the slightest question mark over any pesticide, it is automatically brought forwa[illegible]tantly for review. We are prioritising the review of al[illegible]ticides so that those in the top category will be rev[illegible]speedily.

3. Mr. Tony Banks [illegible] Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food [illegible]eat pies have been eaten since 28 June.

Mr. Maclean: The infor[illegible]ion requested by the hon. Gentleman is not available.

Mr. Banks: That is a great pity. Is the Minister aware that a constituent of mine, who is a regular eater of that great British institution the lukewarm meat pie, has become very concerned because, having eaten a number of them recently, the world has been dropping out of his bottom. He wants me to ask the Minister what checks are carried out to ensure that the unfit meat, of which there is a great deal circulating in London and elsewhere, or meat from BSE-infected cattle, is not going into meat pies. My constituent is worried and I do not want to see my constituents dying off—I cannot afford it.

Mr. Maclean: I am sorry that I was not able to provide the hon. Gentleman with a good line because his wit has been failing of late. However, I can assure him that all meat, as confirmed by the chief medical officer, whether it is in meat pies, sausages or sirloin steak, is perfectly safe to eat, and his constituents have nothing to fear from BSE. We deplore the fact that some unscrupulous or crooked people may be putting unfit meat from knackers' yards into the meat trade. That is despicable and we will take all possible action to crack down on it. However, that is primarily a job for the local authority enforcement officers who are in charge of the legislation. The hon. Gentleman should contact his local authority to ensure that they are spending a fair share of the extra £30 million that we are providing for enforcement.

Mr. Boscawen: Does my hon. Friend realise that a serious issue lies behind that question, and that is the weakening of confidence in the quality of British meat production? People should at all times try to enhance public confidence in the British livestock industry and the safety of its products, or the situation may become disastrous.

Mr. Maclean: I agree entirely. Many hon. Members will remember that disgraceful night when all were in agreement with my right hon. Friend the Minister when he returned from Brussels—except those on the Labour Front Bench, who were condemned by all parties in the House for trying to resurrect a BSE scare and to hype up a situation to scare the British people. That was despicable then and if they are still at it, it is despicable now.

Animal Welfare

4. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the role of veterinarians in promoting animal welfare.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Gummer): The promotion of animal welfare is central to the duties of all vets and they take an oath to that effect.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Is it not a fact that under the Government the number of vets employed by the Ministry has dropped by about 27 per cent? Is not it also true that, because of BSE, veterinary staff have had to be diverted from welfare visits? When will the Government take the issue of animal welfare seriously and recruit sufficient vets to do the job properly?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman must first accept that all vets, whether employed by my Department or anywhere else, must, by their vow, put animal welfare high on the list of their activities. Secondly, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will remember that two veterinary colleges that had been suggested independently for closure, were saved after the matter was reviewed. Thirdly, I hope that he will point out that I have been the progenitor of a major campaign for a code of animal welfare for the EC. The Government are the first to have sought for the EC the same high standards, or higher, as we have in Britain. Britain leads the EC in animal welfare and the Government are determined to ensure that we care about all animals in the EC, not just those in Britain.

Mr. Gale: My right hon. Friend is well aware of the concerns expressed by many vets about the conditions in which live animals are transported for slaughter, sometimes throughout the European Community. Will he reassure the House and members of the British Veterinary Association who work in that area that the Government will not settle for any watered-down European Commission directive that will weaken the standards that we are seeking to set?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that my hon. Friend would not want me to interfere with the judicial review that is taking place at the moment. In general, however, with regard to our present and future policy, we want to ensure that there are high standards for the transport of live animals in every country of the European Community so that animals receive the kind of respect that they should and are properly watered, rested and have lairages of the kind that we would expect in this country; that should apply not only in the northern countries but throughout the European Community.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that not only has there been a 27 per cent. cut in the number of vets in his Department, but there is an increasing shortage of vets and environmental health officers throughout the country just when food safety legislation and increasing moves towards European harmonisation mean that there should be more of them? When will the Government ensure that there are enough vets to meet those demands so that animal welfare does not suffer?

Mr. Gummer: I very much welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Opposition Front Bench. In dealing with this matter, in which he has a great personal interest, the hon. Gentleman will probably find that the Government have accepted the main recommendation of the Page committee to remove the ceiling on intakes at veterinary schools. The Universities Funding Council is considering bids for increased student places put forward by the six schools. We are therefore doing precisely what the hon. Gentleman would want us to do, even though some independent advice in the past suggested that we should not do that. We have decided that we need more vets and we shall continue in that view.

We are also consulting on the possible extension of the role of veterinary nurses and laypersons to relieve some of the burdens on qualified veterinary surgeons. I hope also that the hon. Gentleman would agree with our view in the European Community that it does not help if we spread to vets repetitive and basic jobs which could be performed by other people, thus relieving vets for the jobs that they should be doing.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's concern about environmental health officers, I hope that he will notice the extra £30 million of resources to local authorities for that purpose.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of the major bars to increasing the number of animals exported on the hook rather than on the hoof is the lack of abattoirs that are up to European Community standards? Are there any plans to provide additional support from national or European funds to bring the abattoirs up to that standard?

Mr. Gummer: If that were so, my hon. Friend would have a case. However, there is a demand for live animals rather than animals exported on the hook. So long as the animals are properly exported, in proper conditions and with proper protections, that must be possible within the Community.

Research Spending

6. Mr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much he expects to spend in the current year on agriculture and food research at current prices.

Mr. Gummer: My Department plans to spend £100 million on research and development in the areas of agriculture and food in this current year.

Mr. Strang: Does the Minister acknowledge the important contribution made by Government-funded agricultural research in the huge increases in self-sufficiency achieved by the industry in the past 20 years? Does he recognise that when it comes to some of the modern health and environmental problems of intensive agriculture, Government-funded research, as opposed to commercially-funded research, is more important then ever? Against that background, is it not time that the Government reversed their policy of cutting agricultural research, as the Minister knows not only that the figure that he announced this afternoon is less in real terms than what the Government spent last year but that the Government have cut spending by 30 per cent. in the past 10 years?

Mr. Gummer: I agree entirely with the purpose of Government spending in this matter. We are spending the necessary money on the matters to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I am not prepared to spend money on matters that should be paid for by those who will get immediate commercial results from it. The industry should pay that. I am paying money for food safety, food protection and the development of less harmful pesticides, for example—the kinds of things that we can use to improve the environment. All those things have a public interest, such as medium and long-term research. That is what I should be spending money on. In those matters I have been able to increase our spending. That seems to be a proper use of Government money.

Mr. Hind: Will my right hon. Friend spend a small amount of the money that he has allocated for research on behalf of small arable farmers and growers who feel that the five major supermarkets in this country are using their dominant position to repress the prices of horticultural products to the detriment of farmers, with a particular view to referring the results to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for consideration?

Mr. Gummer: I am not sure whether that would be a proper use of our research money. If my hon. Friend is concerned about particular points, I shall certainly look at them and see whether action is required.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Minister conduct an urgent inquiry into the widespread use of the flavour enhancer, monosodium glutamate? Clear evidence is now coming forward that it produces severe allergies in people who eat meat pies and processed foods as well as in those who eat in restaurants. Is the Minister aware that the symptoms not only include the condition described earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) but can lead to severe dizziness and loss of memory? This matter is now reaching proportions which must be urgently investigated, and I hope that that will be done.

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that, if there is any concern about this matter, we can ask the committee on toxicity to look at it. I am very ready to take any information that the hon. Gentleman or anyone else has on this matter. The way in which we operate is to take all information and look at it immediately. I ask the hon. Gentleman to let me know.

British Coal (Waste Dumping)

7. Mr. Holt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will reconsider the practice of issuing licences to British Coal permitting the dumping of waste products on beaches on the north-east coast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: British Coal has been told that no licence for the dumping of minestone on beaches will be issued after June 1995 unless it can show that there is absolutely no viable alternative.

Mr. Holt: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. He will, of course, have read carefully the Government's recent White Paper on the environment, and he will also have studied the paper put out by the Labour party. He will have noticed that, despite its claims to having specific details, the Labour party has nowhere stated how it will deal with the problem in the north-east of England. Will my hon. Friend accept that although the Government appear to have a five-year commitment, my hon. Friend's statement is loose and open-ended and does not commend itself to the people of the north-east of England? We want the Government not merely to state that they might elongate the period but to shorten it to three years, two years, or even one year. The problem can be resolved by British Coal without detriment to the environment and it is time that the Government did something solid about the issue.

Mr. Curry: That was precisely the purpose of my decision. British Coal has to find an alternative, get it through the planning procedures and then implement it. I want to make sure that local people and local bodies are involved in that process through the planning decision. That takes a certain amount of time. It is better to get the right solution than to force British Coal to act so quickly that it has a plausible claim that it has not been given adequate time to do the job.

That illustrates precisely that environmental problems are not easy. We have a choice between dumping waste on the beach, in the sea or down a hole, or building a tip, none of which is an easy option—showing, if I may so put it, that green issues are not black and white.

Mr. Cummings: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) for raising this vexatious problem. Is the Minister aware that four collieries remain in my constituency in Durham and provide about 6,000 much-needed jobs? Is the Minister aware also that those four collieries have contributed substantially to the overall performance of British Coal? If the Minister intends to review licences in future, will he ensure that there is close liaison between himself and the Department of Energy so that no further extra costs fall on British Coal and perhaps jeopardise pits, jobs and communities in the north-east?

Mr. Curry: I of course recognise that the hon. Gentleman is deeply concerned because of his constituents' interest in the matter. The Department of Energy was associated with my decision. We observe the principle that the polluter pays and British Coal must therefore bear the costs of the exercise. British Coal must also decide the future of those pits on their merits; that is not for my Department. The object is to address a difficult dilemma and to address the issue that has been highlighted as being central, which is the fact that it is no longer desirable or acceptable to put waste on the beaches or out at sea, as I said earlier. I shall certainly keep the hon. Gentleman informed of developments, because I recognise his interest in the matter.

Free Food

8. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the further distribution of European Economic Community free food in 1990.

Mr. Curry: Distributions of butter and beef by more than 400 designated organisations are now getting underway.

Mr. Cryer: Is the Minister aware that hundreds of pensioners in my constituency, in Bradford generally and elsewhere feel humiliated and angry that they have queued, often for more than an hour at a time, to try to obtain free butter or free meat only to find that because they are not on family credit or income support, they are refused it? As, in a letter to me, the Minister relied on European legislation as being the culprit, will the Government stand up to the Common Market if those are its stringent rules or are the Government hiding under the cloak of EEC legislation? As we have paid more than £14 billion to the Common Market since 1980 is not it time that the Government stood up to the Common Market and allowed people, many of whom fought in the war for this country, to have part of this free handout?

Mr. Curry: If 3,000 tonnes of beef and 3,000 tonnes of butter were distributed among all pensioners, they would get precious little each. Furthermore, a certain number of pensioners might be sufficiently well off not to need that —some of them might be Members of the House.

Mr. Latham: Is not there something absolutely asinine about a situation in which farmers are now experiencing extremely difficult conditions, but we apparently have surpluses that can be given away free?

Mr. Curry: It is true that the sensible approach to the problem is to ensure that we bring our production closer to demand and our costs closer to the marketplace, and that is the policy we have pursued. We have always objected to the scheme because it seems a particularly inefficient way of tackling the problem. If one does not identify the problem correctly, which is to get the pricing structure right, how can one reach the right solution?

Mr. Mallon: Is the Minister aware of the great disappointment and distress felt in areas of high unemployment such as Northern Ireland because of the restrictive nature of the entitlement to EC free food? Will he assure the House that he will do all in his power to change that, so that those who are technically not on income support or any other benefit do not lose out on the benefit of free EC food to which they should be entitled and of which they are in great need?

Mr. Curry: I give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that we shall do our best to ensure that those who are entitled to the free food have access to it. That is why the number of organisations involved has more than tripled this year to more than 400. However, I am not prepared to say that the scheme should be opened more generally to all pensioners, because that would be grotesquely inefficient. It seems plain common sense that the free food should be directed to those who are most in need and we shall seek to maintain that that is the case if we have to maintain the scheme at all, which I profoundly hope that we shall not.

Mr. Knapman: Have there been any distributions of surplus free food in socialist countries?

Mr. Curry: I understand that certain countries in the European Community that would describe themselves as Social Democratic have done so. However, the problem in eastern Europe is the queues of people trying to get into the supermarkets, not the queues of people trying to get out.

Animal Welfare

10. Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what initiatives he has taken to improve animal welfare throughout the European Community.

Mr. Gummer: I am pressing for the adoption of comprehensive Community rules setting high welfare standards for animals on farms, during transport and at slaughter.

Mr. Moss: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the positive lead that he is taking on this issue in the European Community. Does he agree with the vast majority of the British public that the conduct of some French farmers of late is entirely unacceptable? Will he take action to ensure that our high standards on animal welfare, particularly on the live transportation of animals, become the benchmark of any future European Community legislation?

Mr. Gummer: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I am sure that he will be pleased to know that I have received further assurances from the French Government about the continuance of cases against people who indulge in those appalling acts. I am sure that he would also want us to raise our standards in those few areas in which we do not reach the highest, and then ensure that the whole of Europe continues to improve its standards, as it ought, as intra-Community trade increases.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Minister have a word with the hon. Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison) and the right hon. Member for City of Chester (Mr. Morrison) about what is happening on Islay and the way in which, for commercial reasons, A and C Sporting Services is apparently being allowed to conduct the slaughter of the rare white-fronted Greenland goose? It is a European scandal.

Mr. Gummer: I am responsible for many things, but the white-fronted Greenland goose is not one of them. I am perfectly happy to ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to look into the matter. In so far as it is my responsibility or that of the Secretary of State for Scotland, I shall see that attention is drawn to the hon. Gentleman's remarks at once.

Dame Janet Fookes: What steps is my right hon. Friend taking to ensure that there are adequate numbers of inspectors and adequate enforcement procedures, without which the welfare regulations will not be worth the paper on which they are written?

Mr. Gummer: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It is not possible to have effective welfare regulations unless they are properly enforced. One thing that we seek to do in the European Community is to ensure that countries that claim to meet high standards can show that they are doing so by having proper inspectors and proper enforcement. Indeed, we are having discussions with the Commission about several countries. We shall make sure that at the end of them we are much happier about enforcement of the present rules in those countries. We also want to improve the rules considerably.

Mr. Skinner: Is it true that the Minister is looking into the possibility of sending a fact-finding tour of Members of Parliament to Greenland in the winter to look after the Greenland goose? Or is it that he cannot find enough people because they are all on fact-finding tours between the Tropic of Cancer and the Tropic of Capricorn? Why does not he send one there instead?

Mr. Gummer: I am not sure that a fact-finding tour in Greenland would be helpful on this occasion. I promise the hon. Gentleman that if I send a tour to Greenland, he will have first option for a place on it and it will be at a time of year to suit his convenience and personal bodily comfort.

Dairy Industry

11. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the impact of the single European market on the United Kingdom dairy industry.

Mr. Curry: I have received representations from a wide range of organisations covering issues such as possible changes to the milk marketing arrangements, the future operation of the milk quota system, and the Commission's proposals for Communitywide milk hygiene standards.

Mr. Evennett: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply on that point. Could he comment further on the future of the Milk Marketing Board after 1992?

Mr. Curry: The Milk Marketing Board started the debate about its future because it believes that the present system is unsatisfactory. The Government have never concealed that they believe that a statutory monopoly, which is locked into a negotiating structure with a single buying organisation, no longer serves the best interests of farmers, consumers or the ability of the dairy trade to compete in the wider European market. An increasing number of people echo that. The formula must be sorted out by the Milk Marketing Board itself.

Mr. Geraint Howells: When the Minister discussed the European single market, what representations were made to him that the agriculture industry is going through the worst recession since the war? Can he confirm or deny that his Government are backing a 30 per cent. cut in the support system for agriculture? If they are, why are they hell bent on destroying the agriculture industry, which has helped consumers so well over the past 50 years?

Mr. Curry: Because the Government take the clear view that, first, it is in the interests of the welfare of the whole of the Community. Secondly, it is clearly in the interests of the United Kingdom and European farmers that we should take the lead and control the negotiations rather than fail dismally to formulate proposals, as Agriculture Ministers have done recently, as that would allow those who would like to see a much more draconian attack upon our system to prevail in the negotiations. Our position is the only sensible one and the only one which properly defends the interests of our farmers and continental farmers.

Mr. Marland: As the United Kingdom has such a high standard of milk production and hygiene, can my hon. Friend assure the House that after 1992 all other European countries will be required to come up to our standards?

Mr. Curry: I can assure my hon. Friend that the proposals before us mean that countries whose current standards are not as good as our own will come up to those standards. The United Kingdom has already achieved the standards that will be demanded under those proposals.

Scottish Fishing Industry

12. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next intends to meet representatives of the catching sector of the Scottish fishery industry; and what assistance he is making available to that sector.

Mr. Curry: My noble Friend the Minister responsible for Scottish agriculture and fisheries regularly meets the Scottish fishing industry. I shall meet its representatives if they so desire.

Mr. Salmond: If the Minister arranges such a meeting, will he attempt to explain to the industry's representatives why the Government have cancelled Export Credits Guarantee Department cover, which affects trade with the Soviet Union on the herring and mackerel fleets? Does the Minister agree that the Government look quite absurd when the Prime Minister claims at international conferences that trade with the Soviet Union should be developed while her own Departments are sabotaging the existing trade? When will the Minister start to assist the Scottish fishing industry and stop sabotaging its prospects?

Mr. Curry: The future of the ECGD is not a matter for my Department. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman realises that what will actually happen is that the Klondiking fleets will no longer appear off British coasts. It is not so much a problem of ECGD cover, but the obsolescence and the necessary radical restructuring of the fleets of eastern Europe after a generation of wholly inefficient socialist governments.

Dame Peggy Fenner: Is my hon. Friend aware that some discontent has been expressed at the achievements in the activities of the sea fishing industry? Does he believe that if achievements in those activities cannot be realised, it is time to reconsider the levy system?

Mr. Curry: I am sure that my hon. Friend knows that the Sea Fish Industry Authority has submitted proposals for an increase in the levy. Before I take any decision on that, I shall review carefully the industry's opinion expressed to me. I shall want to be satisfied that the Sea Fish Industry Authority has a clear idea about what it exists to do and that it is acting efficiently.

Livestock Exports

13. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the numbers of livestock being exported live from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: The following figures cover exports from the United Kingdom of farm livestock and horses for all purposes during the period January to August 1990 inclusive: cattle 175,975; sheep 295,928; pigs 79,114; goats 107 and horses 3,845.

Mr. Davies: Will the Minister confirm that under article 36 of the treaty of Rome he is empowered to take steps to stop the export of live animals from this country if he is satisfied that that action is necessary to protect the health and life of those animals? Given the shocking scenes that we have seen of brutal mistreatment of British animals by rioting French farmers, is not it time that he took steps to bring the international trade in live animals to a halt?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that that matter is subject to judicial review today in the High Court. I cannot comment further on it.

Mr. Monte: Does my hon. Friend expect to see those figures increased one day by the export of live horses for slaughter and consumption on the continent, or is he confident that we have the power to stop those new European regulations coming into effect?

Mr. Maclean: Like everyone in the House, we sincerely hope not. We have had some extremely tough negotiations on the matter and we have made it plain that we support the minimum values principles, which are very good rules and have stood us in long stead. We shall continue fighting so that British horses are not exported live for slaughter and human consumption on the continent.

Eastern Europe

15. Mr. Burt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what help his Department has given to farmers in eastern Europe.

Mr. Gummer: I have undertaken a series of visits to east and central European countries and have taken other initiatives to promote United Kingdom trade co-operation on the transfer of appropriate technology.

Mr. Burt: I am delighted to learn of the extent of help that we are giving. Bearing in mind the track record of socialist agriculture, does my right hon. Friend agree that the best advice that this country can give is to echo the words of the new Polish Member of Parliament who is the chairman of that country's privatisation committee and who said in this country last week that socialism cannot be improved but must be removed?

Mr. Gummer: Anybody who thinks that centralised control, direction by the state and the fixing of norms, all of which are policies upheld by the Labour party in this country, do any good had better try to get a square meal in any of the eastern European countries.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 October.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Butterfill: Has my right hon. Friend found time in her busy day today to read the report of the Audit Commission on managing sickness absence in London? If so, does she share my concern that socialist authorities in London are tolerating sickness absence of two and a half times the average in local authorities elsewhere and that that is costing their community charge payers an estimated £27 a head?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I have seen the Audit Commission's report and have noted what my hon. Friend said, that is, that absentee levels in certain local authorities are nearly three times those in private industry and that some of those local authorities are not even aware of what the absentee levels are, let alone able to take any action about it. That is grossly unfair to the charge payer and once more proves that Labour authorities are totally inadequate from the point of view of financial control.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister make it clear to everyone today that she is completely against vouchers for schooling?

The Prime Minister: We have an introduction of vouchers for training. That is very good because it increases choice. In education we are attempting to increase choice—in city technology colleges, in grant-maintained schools and with open rolls. Of course, local authorities are against choice. They want central controls. They do not want opportunity, and that is why the right hon. Gentleman is against choice and against vouchers anywhere.

Mr. Kinnock: Even though the right hon. Lady is trying to evade, it is obvious from what she said last week and from what she just said that she is in favour of vouchers for schooling. The Prime Minister is a crank—[Interruption.] Is not it obvious to her that every examination ever undertaken into vouchers, including that done by her noble Friend Lord Joseph, has concluded that vouchers are an expensive, bureaucratic, divisive system entirely irrelevant to the real needs of schooling?

The Prime Minister: Nonsense—[Interruption.] Nonsense. They are one, and only one, method of what we are already operating; the money follows the pupil. That is a form of giving extra choice and of giving the voucher to the parent for the pupil. Of course the right hon. Gentleman hates it. He wants total central control of education through socialist, Labour authorities that hold money back from locally managed schools. Of course he hates choice. Of course he hates higher standards. Of course he hates opportunity. He is socialist—a crypto-communist. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kinnock: It is a long time since we had quite such a tantrum from the Prime Minister at Prime Minister's Question Time. Everyone knows that the British education system is now more centralised than it has ever been. Everyone also knows that the Prime Minister has spent the past 11 years making a complete mess of education. Why does she not now start concentrating on the things that need to be done to help education, and stop chasing after the things that can only hurt education?

The Prime Minister: On the contrary, with city technology colleges, grant-maintained schools and locally managed schools we are totally and utterly decentralising power and responsibility away from the local education authorities to the parents. That is what the right hon. Gentleman objects to. In the meantime, let me point out to him that, during the stewardship of the Conservative Government, expenditure per pupil in education has increased from £515 to £1,360—an increase of 41 per cent. According to an OECD report quoted in The Sunday Times last week, when it comes to the percentage of our national income per head spent on education, Britain has a higher percentage than the United States, Japan or Germany.

Q2. Mr. Burt: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Burt: Bearing in mind the previous exchange, I wonder whether my right hon. Friend has seen news reports today about a head teacher who describes himself as chap, and who now runs a successful grant-maintained school in the north of England that takes its pupils from nearby council estates. Does she believe that the aspirations of those parents and children will be fulfilled by any big idea that threatens to destroy their choice and opportunity in grant-maintained schools?

"a former knee-jerk anti-Tory"

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend, as usual, is absolutely spot on. The money goes directly to the grant-maintained schools—into the classroom and not into the local education authority administration.

Head teachers of grant-maintained schools find them extremely good. There have been a number of comments about them recently—the head of Bankfield school in Cheshire, for instance, has said:

"18 months ago I had serious reservations about the applications for grant-maintained status—not now. For me seeing and experiencing has been believing."

Another in Northampton said—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister is answering a question.

The Prime Minister: Another head teacher, from Hendon, said:

"We have more time to deal with educational issues as opposed to administration and coping with bureaucracy."

That is another example of a head teacher satisfied with a grant-maintained school. A third said:

"We are finding it easier to recruit staff."

Of course the right hon. Gentleman does not like that, because it means more staff and less bureaucracy; however, the schools are good.

Mr. Ashdown: Given the Prime Minister's previous answers, why does she disagree with her own Secretary of State for Education and Science, who said over the weekend that he felt that the introduction of education vouchers would be an unnecessary distraction from the real task—putting right what was wrong with Britain's failing education system?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is sitting next to me, and disagrees totally with the right hon. Gentleman's interpretation of what he said. Had the right hon. Gentleman listened to what I said earlier, he would have realised that city technology colleges, grant-maintained schools and, to some extent, open enrolment are a form of choice for parents. If we add to that the money following the pupil, it is virtually a voucher system.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity of inviting in the head of Twyford high school in Ealing, Hazel Hardy, the head of Lilian Baylis school in Waterloo and Peter Dawson, who used to be the headmaster of Eltham Green school in my constituency and get them to explain how it is that, with the opportunity of attracting pupils to their schools, they have managed to make the schools attractive to ethnic minorities and poor families and to provide the type of education that the Leader of the Opposition received in Wales? More families at the bottom need choice, and with my right hon. Friend and the Secretary of State for Education and Science, we expect to see more of it.

The Prime Minister: I totally agree with my hon. Friend. Choice is for the overwhelming majority of those who go to the public system of education. That is why we are extending it. That is why we have grant-maintained schools, which are independent state schools and that is why we are giving more choice to parents, knowing full well that they will use it to go to the school that offers the highest standards of education. More choice means better standards and more opportunity.

Q3. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winnick: Can the Prime Minister give any explanation why the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) remains convinced that it was the Foreign Secretary who suggested that he make the visit to Iraq, although I am aware that the latter has strongly denied that? What is the Prime Minister's own view about the forthcoming trip, bearing it in mind that, we hope, some sick and elderly British hostages will be released—people who should never have been taken hostage in the first place? Indeed, no one should have been taken hostage.

The Prime Minister: Of course people should never have been taken hostage in the first place. That is why we are all at one in the House in insisting that the United Nations resolutions must be upheld, and insisting that every day that the hostages are held is a fresh offence and act of war. As far as my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) is concerned, he will make his own best judgments. If he decides to visit Iraq, or any other country, he will of course be given the normal courtesies. Similar facilities were available for those Opposition Members who visited Iraq recently.

Q5. Mr. Marland: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon.Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marland: Has my right hon. Friend had the opportunity to study the recent confession by Mr. Herman Ouesley, the chief executive of Labour-controlled Lambeth council, who laments that no final accounts have been prepared in Lambeth since 1985 and that 40,000 community charge bills have not been sent out? He also laments what he describes as "corruption" in the administration system and says that the financial situation is near catastrophic. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that reflects the flavour of a possible future Labour Government?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I saw the report in the Local Government Chronicle to the effect that Lambeth had not finalised its accounts since about 1985, which is an utter disgrace for any local authority. I think that the chief executive was very critical about it. That is typical of Labour's financial management, typical of the way that their last Government handled the nation's affairs, and typical of the way in which Labour authorities carry on, and it is very adverse to community charge payers and the services that they receive.

Mr. Galloway: As the Prime Minister knows, there is an election next week in Pakistan. Does she accept that there is now a real fear in Pakistan that, having failed to find a legal case against Benazir Bhutto and, largely thanks to President Bush, having failed to have the elections called off, Miss Bhutto's enemies may have concluded that the only way to stop her becoming Prime Minister again is to kill her? Will the Prime Minister make it clear today that Britain expects next Thursday's election in Pakistan to be free and fair? Will she ask her ambassador in Islamabad to convey to the Pakistani authorities her concern for the life of Benazir Bhutto?

The Prime Minister: When the high commissioner of Pakistan came to see me yesterday, because his period of accreditation to this country is over, I raised the matter with him. I said that we all expected those elections to be fully free and fair and that we shall watch carefully to see whether they are free and fair. We are aware of all the concerns about them.

Q8. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the recently announced rents-to-mortgages scheme will bring the reality of home ownership to many thousands of families who never believed that that option would be available to them? Does my right hon. Friend further agree that, rather than being an irrelevant scheme, as it has been described by the Labour party, it will be so successful that in the end the Labour party will claim that it was its own idea?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, the original right-to-buy scheme has enabled about 1·5 million council tenants to purchase their homes. There are some who are still unable, under that scheme, to take the plunge but who would like to purchase their homes. In Scotland and Wales, therefore, we have run a pilot scheme on rents to mortgages. A number of people have taken advantage of it. We intend to run a pilot scheme in England for new-town houses to find out whether the scheme would also be welcomed here, with a view, if it succeeds, to extending it much more widely in order to enable another group of people to enjoy the benefits of home ownership, which they would never have got from the Labour party.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Will the Leader of the House tell us the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Sir Geoffrey Howe): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 22 OCTOBER—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Employment Bill and the Landlord and Tenant (Licensed Premises) Bill.

Motion to take note of EC document relating to the proposal for a European company statute. Details will be given in the Official Report.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

TUESDAY 23 OCTOBER—There will be a debate on the exchange rate mechanism, on a Government motion.

Motion on the British Nationality (Hong Kong) (Selection Scheme) Order 1990.

WEDNESDAY 24 OCTOBER—Motions relating to European Standing Committees, European Community legislation and parliamentary questions.

Motion to take note of EC document relating to the extension of EC aid to other countries of central and eastern Europe. Details will be given in the Official Report.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

THURSDAY 25 OCTOBER—Progress on consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Broadcasting Bill.

FRIDAY 26 OCTOBER—Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Courts and Legal Services Bill [Lords].

Completion of consideration of any Lords amendments to the Broadcasting Bill.

MONDAY 29 OCTOBER—Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Environmental Protection Bill.

Dr. Cunningham: Can the House expect a statement next week from the Foreign Secretary when he returns from his important visit to the middle east? Since that visit involved discussions about the situation in Israel and the Palestinians and also about the grave situation in the Gulf, will the Leader of the House ask his right hon. Friend to come to Parliament as soon as possible to report on his talks?

May we also have an assurance that the Secretary of State for Social Security will make an oral statement next week about the Government's plans for the uprating of benefits? That decision will have important consequences for millions of British families. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will want to question the Secretary of State about his proposals.

May I also ask the Leader of the House to reconsider his unusual decision to timetable the consideration of Lords amendments to the Broadcasting Bill on Friday and to make it the second business for that day? It is unacceptable that legislation that is so important and at the same time so controversial should be timetabled for Friday rather than for a normal full sitting day of the House. The legislation raises important questions, which do not necessarily reflect simply party political divisions. I hope that on reconsideration that business can be taken on another day.

Will the Leader of the House urge his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to reconsider her decision to duck out of the debate on Britain's membership of the exchange rate mechanism? The Prime Minister, as First Lord of the Treasury, has primary responsibility for Government economic policy. Is not it strange that, on the most important economic decision of the moment, the Prime Minister is running away from a debate in the House? The right hon. Lady already has the worst record in recent memory of any Prime Minister for attending debates in the House. Why is she running away from this issue? Is it that she is unwilling to face not only Labour party opposition, but searching questions from her own party on her U-turn, or is it that she no longer has any stomach for the fight?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman will recollect that his colleague, the Opposition Chief Whip, raised with me on Monday the issue of a statement by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. As I said then, I shall convey his request to my right hon. Friend on his return to this country.

I note the request that the hon. Gentleman makes about a statement from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security. The House will be informed in due course, and I shall tell my right hon. Friend that the matter has been raised.

I can understand why the hon. Gentleman raised his third point, but I cannot accept his contention that Friday should not be regarded as a proper parliamentary day. The House will appreciate that it is necessary at this stage to make progress on all these matters. Obviously, I hope that satisfactory arrangements can be agreed through the usual channels as we have already laid them out. Progress along the lines I have suggested will be important and make sense if we are to achieve the equally sensible objective of Parliament being prorogued in the week commencing 29 October.

Finally, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who made the announcement about entry into the exchange rate mechanism, as is proper, will prove to be much more than a match for the Leader of the Opposition. If the hon. Gentleman's point is to be taken seriously, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was asked about this in the House on Tuesday and she can be asked about it next Tuesday. It is interesting that no Opposition Member asked about it this afternoon.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Can my right hon. and learned Friend tell the House what progress he is making on the parliamentary pensions Bill?

[Sir Geoffrey Finsberg]

I ask that question as one of the trustees of the fund. We have twice had the matter down for debate but nothing concrete has yet transpired.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter in the absence of the chairman of the trustees. As my hon. Friend knows, the current position is that there have been lengthy discussions with the trustees about the package of changes involved in the Ministerial and Other Offices (Pensions and Salaries) Bill and in the regulations associated with it. I have been seeking all along to respond sympathetically to the various concerns expressed in the debate on 17 January this year and subsequently. I have been happy to accommodate the trustees' request for further time to consider the proposals. I shall be meeting the trustees again next week. In consequence of that, I do not now expect to make further progress with the Bill in what remains of this Session, but I shall seek to do so as speedily as possible in the new Session.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I am sure that the Leader of the House will recall that, during the recess, Mr. David Calcutt came forward with his report on the Colin Wallace case. He observed that Ministry of Defence officials had seen the chairman of the appeal tribunal before which Mr. Wallace was to appear and he believed that that had influenced the outcome of the appeal. Given such serious allegations, surely one would expect that we would have had a statement from the Secretary of State for Defence this week. At the very least, can we expect a statement next week or, better still, a debate on this important issue which simply will not go away?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Government have accepted the conclusion and recommendation made by Mr. David Calcutt in his report, and my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Sir M. Marshall) about the matter on 13 September. A copy of that letter is in the Library of the House.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the deputy Prime Minister will join me in expressing heartfelt sympathy to the family of my constituent, Stephen Craig, who was murdered by the IRA on Tuesday evening, and to the relatives of the other victim, a Roman Catholic, who was murdered the same evening. May we have time to debate the slaughter of the innocents in Northern Ireland as a matter of urgency, because it is high time that that slaughter was brought to an end, in the interests of all people in the Province whatever their religious or political beliefs?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The House will agree with the objective stated at the end of that question, but I cannot promise the prospect of an early debate on this important matter. Both murders are the subject of a full police investigation. Several people are helping the police with their inquiries into the murder of the police dog handler, Samuel Todd. I am sure that the House will join me in extending sympathy to the families of both victims of such tragic murders.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman reconsider arranging a debate on eastern Europe? I note that next week it can be debated, but should not there be a general debate on eastern Europe, especially as the Conservative party has begun a political programme, including speeches at its conference, trying to suggest that democratic socialism equates with Stalinism? Some of us resent that very much indeed, based on our experience of consistently arguing that there was no socialism in the Soviet Union and eastern Europe. Socialism means freedom. The suggestions of Conservative Members that the capitalist system is the only free system in the world is not true, and we want to debate that.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am glad to have the opportunity to reply to the hon. Gentleman. To some extent, the matter can be touched on in tomorrow's debate on the unification of Germany. In the time that remains before prorogation, I cannot promise him the prospect of a wider debate, but I counsel him, despite the sincerity with which he holds his view, to reflect further on what he has just said. Last week, the British people saw a procession of undoubted leaders of the newly freed countries of Europe coming quite spontaneously to our conference——

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): It was a set-up.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If the hon. Gentleman believes that, he will believe anything. Those people came to our party conference to express their solidarity with the democracy for which this party stands, and we are entitled to take the credit for it.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the haemophiliacs who were injected with imported blood containing the HIV virus were the victims of a unique accident which is not the stuff of precedent, and as such are not they entitled to generous, once-off, compassionate compensation? If the Government were not persuaded of that by the excellent Adjournment debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), will he please arrange a full debate on the subject so that Back Benchers have a chance to persuade the Government?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my hon. Friend says, the matter was raised in the House on Tuesday in an Adjournment debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall). I cannot add anything further to what was said then.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): May we have some time next week to discuss the role of Scottish Homes, a Government quango north of the border, as that body has refused to carry out basic essential repairs to properties in my constituency? Sir James Mellon, the chairman of Scottish Homes, is making all sorts of excuses for not carrying out that basic work on behalf of people who are paying high rents for properties that are about to fall down —and I do not exaggerate. May we have some action, even if it is only a debate next week, on this issue, which is vital to people who are concerned about what is happening to them? We talk about a property-owning democracy, but that is a sham, because the Government own these properties. They should be doing something about them.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot offer the prospect of a debate on that issue. All I can do is bring the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Will my right hon. and learned Friend think again about the suggestion by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer)—I am sure that we are all pleased to see the hon. Gentleman in his place—that there should be a debate on eastern Europe? Events in the Gulf have tended to cloud the great volatility that still exists in that part of the continent. Those of us who recently returned from Yugoslavia are aware of the risk of civil war in that country, the results of which would be incalculable. Will my right hon. and learned Friend please think again about having an early debate on eastern Europe?

Sir Geofffrey Howe: I understand why my hon. Friend presses me on that point. I do not underestimate the legitimate and widespread interest in this topic, but I have no possible scope for a debate on it before prorogation. There will be an opportunity to raise that matter on the foreign affairs day of the debate on the Gracious Speech. I shall bear my hon. Friend's point in mind thereafter.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I welcome the debate on the ERM. Does the Leader of the House agree that it would be welcome, not only to Back Benchers on both sides of the House but to members of the Cabinet, if he were to announce today that there will be a free vote at the end of the debate?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Whipping is not, of course, a matter for the Leader of the House. It is for the Chief Whips, both of whom are here, to give to the right hon. Gentleman's observation such attention as they think is due.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): The excellent report of the working party on noise which was published this afternoon by the Department of the Environment deals with the noise nuisance to large numbers of our constituents from such sources as aircraft, helicopters, trains, lorries, amplified music, late-night parties, dogs and burglar alarms. Can we please discuss that report reasonably soon? I remind my right hon. and learned Friend that the secretary to the working party was my late constituent, Charlie Bayne, who was warmly commended by the chairman in his introduction for the respect in which he was held for his great tenacity and application.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend will understand that I cannot respond positively at this stage to his request for such a debate, although I gladly join him in expressing my sympathy to Charlie Bayne's family. Charlie Bayne's father was one of Her Majesty's ambassadors during my time at the Foreign Office. I am sure that my colleagues would wish to endorse what was said by the working party about the courage with which he discharged his duty on the secretariat to the working party.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the announcement this week of the motion setting up the Select Committees to scrutinise the Department of Health and the Department of Social Security. Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman give us an assurance that, before we rise at the end of this Session, there will be a similar motion to set up a Select Committee on Northern Ireland, an aspect of government which needs to be scrutinised; or will we have to continue to hasten slowly?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The matter is summed up in the hon. Gentleman's closing words. I admire his tenacity, but he cannot expect that to be matched by celerity on this matter.

Sir Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): When we discuss next Tuesday our entry into the ERM, will the basis of that debate be sufficiently widely drawn so that we may also discuss the simultaneous reduction in interest rates and so that any hon. Members who doubt the wisdom of linking those decisions may express their views?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I should be extremely surprised if it were possible to design a motion on that topic which excluded the important matter that my hon. Friend has in mind.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his reply to the first question of my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham)? The Foreign Secretary returns from the middle east tomorrow evening. Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate on the trip next week so that some of us can get a statement from the Foreign Secretary on what he said in the different countries to explain the British Government's support for immediate action when Iraq invaded Kuwait, for example, compared with the fact that, 23 years after Israel occupied Jerusalem, the West Bank and the Gaza strip—and especially after the murder of 21 Palestinians last Monday—the United Nations sat for five days and then decided to send three assistants from the Secretary-General's office? Is that a result of double standards or is it because the Palestinians have no oil?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I was not asked to arrange a debate on that matter, but I was asked to pass on a request for a statement from my right hon. Friend, and I will do that. I do not begin to underestimate the importance of the hon. Gentleman's point. However, I do not have the impression that my right hon. Friend's journey to the middle east has been notorious for his lack of plain speaking on the matter that the hon. Gentleman has in mind.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Has my right hon. and learned Friend noted that we sat up late last night dealing with a series of private Bills, and that he has announced more private Bill business for next week? Is he aware that, in the time it has taken, for example, to consider the King's Cross Bill, the Toyota motor corporation has sussed out Europe, sussed out more than 20 sites in this country, picked my constituency, purchased 600 acres of land, obtained planning permission, gone through a compulsory purchase order inquiry and let the contract, is building a factory and will be producing the cars before a single brick is laid at King's Cross? How are we to modernise our country and its infrastructure and, most of all, improve our ports, our harbours and our railways if we are to stick to such an outdated system of procedure in this House?

Mr. Speaker: Mrs. Alice Mahon.

Sir Geoffrey Howe rose——

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I was thinking of something else.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend's question was intended largely to answer itself and it went a fair way towards doing so. She is right. We shall press ahead with reforms in the private Bill procedure because they are a matter of some importance.

Mr. Speaker: Mrs. Alice Mahon.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did not think that the question of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) was worth an answer either.

Given today's unemployment figure, will the Leader of the House make time for a debate on unemployment? In my constituency, 2,000 jobs in manufacturing have gone since January. If he grants such a debate, perhaps we could look in detail at the practices of directors such as Michael Ashcroft, who bled Coloroll dry, took £1·2 million in dividends the year before it went bankrupt and paid himself £500,000 in salary. Yet the Government are now trying to blame low-paid textile workers for the mess they are in.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Lady is, of course, entitled to draw attention to the rise in unemployment figures reported today. However, they should be set in the much broader context of the very long-term achievements of the present Government. Employment, for example, is at an all-time high. The United Kingdom still has one of the lowest unemployment rates in the European Community. That is the background against which to judge her point.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give us an early debate on defence issues? The Ministry of Defence currently has the enormous task of building up for the Gulf, and another enormous task of seeing where economies can be made on the defence estate and on all the other costs of defence. The House is interested to achieve the maximum defence dividend, while ensuring that the defence of the realm is preserved. May we have a debate on this subject as soon as possible?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: At this stage, I can promise nothing more than to take note of my hon. Friend's important point.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): Will the Leader of the House make arrangements for a stairlift or other form of access for wheelchair users to be able to reach meetings in the Grand Committee Room and in the Jubilee Room, and for a loop for hearing-impaired visitors?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall certainly see that those two points are considered as fully as they deserve to be.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): When can we expect a statement from my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the breakdown of discussions in Brussels on the future of the agriculture budget in the light of the GATT discussions? Many farmers are already facing serious financial difficulty and it is right that the House should consider that. The threat of any reduction in subsidy is already causing grave concern. World affairs are extremely important, but many people in Britain feel that the House does not spend sufficient time on our own domestic problems.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I understand the importance of the agriculture questions raised by my hon. Friend, in which one has to strike the right balance between the need for reform on the world stage and the needs of our own, like other national farming communities. I cannot promise a statement on the topic next week, as my right hon. Friend the Minister will be returning tomorrow to continue the discussions in which he has already been engaged for two days this week.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): Is the Leader of the House aware of the statement made today by the president of the Scottish National Farmers Union, that the industry now faces its worst crisis since the 1930s and that he expects a spate of bankruptcies in the hill and upland sectors? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept the seriousness of the situation and, given the range of problems facing the industry, may we have an urgent debate on the state of agriculture?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am afraid that I cannot offer the prospect of an early debate on that subject, but I do not begin to underrate its importance. For all agricultural communities, the existing state of affairs of widespread national and international intervention by way of subsidy or protection is unsustainable. Her Majesty's Government are playing a leading part in trying to secure progress in the international negotiations that must take place, not least in the EC. We shall continue to do that, and my right hon. Friend will inform the House about his progress as appropriate.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will my right hon. and learned Friend reconsider his earlier disappointing answer about haemophiliacs who are HIV-positive? Is he aware that he will find it increasingly difficult to persuade many of his hon. Friends that the Government are acting in a proper manner in that matter, and the sooner that it is debated in the House and resolved by administrative action and Government decision, rather than by forcing it through the courts, the better.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I understand the point made by my hon. Friend and I do not wish to seem in any sense lacking in sympathy, but the fact is that it has been debated in the House once this week, as I have already observed. I can only undertake to bring his observations to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): I remind the Leader of the House of the terrible disasters that took place on the North sea oil rigs, particularly the Piper Alpha disaster, when 167 technicians and engineers were burnt to death. Following that, the Government set up an inquiry under Lord Cullen, and we were given to understand that the report would be ready for inspection by the House during June or July. We are still awaiting that report, and there is great unrest on the North sea oil rigs about health and safety. When will the House do something about that to bring this terrible matter to an end? Will the Leader of the House consider having a debate in the House on the report?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot give any direct response today to the point raised by the hon. Gentleman, but I shall certainly bring it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Will my right hon. and learned Friend find time at an early date for a debate on trade unions, particularly since the revelation in the Evening Standard of the appearance of ghosts—not just one person with the same name and address as another, but up to seven on the same list for a union election? Is not that a disgrace? Is it possible that such ghosts are responsible for the missing money of the National Union of Mineworkers?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sure that that particular manifestation of ghostliness deserves to be taken extremely seriously, and I shall see whether an opportunity arises for that.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): Will the Leader of the House make time available next week for a debate on the financial crisis facing the national health service? Is he aware that it became apparent this morning that the Wakefield health authority has agreed a huge package of cuts and closures which will have a devastating effect on my constituents who are on hospital waiting lists and who are suffering pain and discomfort? I am aware that such deficits are affecting many health authorities throughout Britain. May we have an urgent debate on the matter?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot promise a debate on that. However, it is important to note that the figures for those on waiting lists at March 1990, which will be published in full quite shortly, show a reduction of almost 5 per cent. since September 1989 in the number of those who have been waiting for more than a year. That represents significant progress.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): Will my right hon. and learned Friend arrange for the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement about the extremely serious situation involving several hundred British drivers and their vehicles which have been stranded for nearly 10 days on the French-Spanish border? Those drivers have suffered great personal difficulties and there will be serious financial consequences. Is not it vital that we hear soon what representations are being made to ensure that the Spanish Government are honouring their obligations under Community rules to allow the free passage of goods and also know whether we are pressing for compensation for those who will suffer financial loss, as the Government did with regard to the lamb war?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I will certainly bring that point to the attention of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): Is the Leader of the House aware of a statement made on Thursday 11 October by the chairman of the Fair Employment Tribunal in Northern Ireland, which has had the effect of nullifying the provisions of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989? In view of the urgency of the matter, and the fact that 199 cases are now at a dead halt, will he provide urgent remedial legislation and time for the House to give effect to the wish of the House, which was that the Act should be implemented and used as quickly as possible?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The point raised by the hon. Gentleman clearly deserves to be studied very closely before I can reach a conclusion about it. I simply undertake to bring it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will my right hon. and learned Friend arrange an early debate on the future of the net book agreement which results in book prices being higher and the number of books being sold smaller than would otherwise be the case?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend has raised an important and interesting point, which deserves the consideration that I will give to it.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Can we have a statement next week on the multi-fibre arrangement and the Government's attitude to it? As has been stated already, the GATT negotiations are under way and there is a feeling within the textile industry that the Government have a lacklustre attitude towards the renewal of the MFA, which both employers and unions regard as vital for the retention of a buoyant and successful textile industry.

Will the Leader of the House assure us that we can have a statement, if not next week then at least in the near future, because 14,000 jobs in Bradford depend directly on textiles and nearly 500,000 throughout the country depend on textiles and clothing? This is a vital matter if we are to retain a textile industry.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I appreciate the importance of the textile industry, which was debated on 26 July, and not long ago, I had an opportunity to study a document from the Apparel, Knitting and Textile Alliance, the burden of which underlined the link between the GATT negotiations and the MFA. If all the parties concerned demonstrate the necessary commitment in the final crucial stage of the Uruguay round negotiations, we can achieve the better balance in world trade which we are all looking for upon the basis laid out in the European Commission's negotiating policy.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Apart from a possible statement from the Foreign Secretary about the situation in the middle east, should not we have another fully-fledged debate about the Gulf crisis? Some of us would like to debate things before war breaks out so that we can try in some small way to influence developments. There was a great demand to speak in the House in our earlier Gulf debate and 40 hon. Members who wanted to speak were not called then. It looks odd to people outside this place that we are not debating the Gulf now that Parliament has returned after the recess, particularly as the danger still exists. There will be differing views about how the situation should be handled and it is right that we should be concerned and that the House should be seen to be debating the issue.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. However, we must fit in other matters in the relatively short time before Parliament is prorogued. It is for that purpose that a Government day next week has been devoted to the ERM debate and the Opposition day has been transferred to the next Session. There will be opportunities after the Queen's Speech, not least in the Queen's Speech debate itself, but I shall bear the hon. Gentleman's point in mind.

Mr. Jim Sillars (Glasgow, Govan): Is the Leader of the House aware that we still do not have a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, despite Standing Order No. 130, which makes it compulsory? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman view the video of yesterday's Scottish Question

[Mr. Jim Sillars]

Time? It is a perfect illustration of the anger felt on these Benches and in many places in Scotland because we are denied the instrument of investigation at precisely the moment when we require it. Is he aware that the Secretary of State for Scotland met the chairman of British Steel on Tuesday and then, at the Dispatch Box yesterday afternoon, offered no detailed statement on the discussions that he had had with the chairman about the future of the Scottish steel industry?

Is the Leader of the House also aware that the British Steel board and chairman are deliberately out to destroy the Scottish steel industry piecemeal and that we are denied by the House the kind of Select Committee that is the one defensive mechanism that we could deploy against them? If he tells me that it is not the Government's responsibility, will he admit the logic of the position that this House of Commons, with its English majority, is denying Scotland the Select Committee the opportunity to defend ourselves in Lanarkshire against the investment that is going to Teesside?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman spoils such case as he has by his overstatement of the matter. It plainly cannot be sustained that British Steel is deliberately out to destroy anything. Moreover, he should note that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland yesterday faced, I should judge, about 20 minutes' questioning on the very topic that the hon. Gentleman raises. He was exposed to full and rigorous questioning by the House, and gave a full account of himself.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I reinforce the point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) that there is a need for a full debate on the Gulf crisis before Prorogation. Surely we owe it to the British people as a whole and to the thousands of British service men in the gulf to keep the matter at the forefront of our deliberations. In view of the press report that the British Government have been privately urging the United States Administration to take an early decision on military action against Iraq, will the Leader of the House take the opportunity this afternoon to affirm that it is still Government policy that mandatory economic sanctions be given a chance to work?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman knows that the Government's policy is to secure full implementation of the resolution that was passed by the United Nations Security Council. I have already acknowledged the case for a debating opportunity as soon as it can be found when the House resumes after Prorogation. The hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity of not only hearing a statement from the Foreign Secretary next Wednesday but asking him questions when he faces the House for questions in the ordinary way.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is the Leader of the House at all uncomfortable that those in the other place who have been most angry about the Nature Conservancy Council are those such as Lord Buxton—Conservative peers who know most about it? Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman understood also that there has been a recent staff vote in the Nature Conservancy Council in which an overwhelming majority of members of staff not only in Peterborough but in Scotland and in Wales have come down against the proposals?

Was not the whole matter misconceived in the first place by wanting to please the Scots, when those of us in Scotland who knew and cared most were passionately against the expensive, costly, wasteful and absurd break-up of the Nature Conservancy Council? In the circumstances, should not there be a statement next week, before we get down to amendments, that the Government have given up the idea, at any rate for this year? There would be no shame in doing so. The time that is saved could be used for a proper statement and a debate on the middle east.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It sounds as though the hon. Gentleman may have some observations to make during our consideration of the Lords amendments to the Environmental Protection Bill on Monday week.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Did the Leader of the House see The Observer magazine last Sunday, which revealed the increasing number of hon. Members who hold outside financial and commercial interests, with the potential for a conflict of interest where the Chairpersons of key parliamentary Committees hold financial and commercial interests that have a direct bearing on the work of their Committees?

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman therefore have any plans to enable the House to decide whether it thinks it right that the hon. Members for Shipley (Sir M. Fox), for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) and for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates), who are all Chairpersons of parliamentary Committees, should hold extensive financial and commercial interests which have a direct bearing on the work of their Committees? Will the Leader of the House give us an opportunity to decide whether we think that that is right, because I can tell him that many of us think that it is entirely wrong?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That colour supplement made a great deal more than I should have imagined possible out of some relatively modest factual material. The questions that both it and the hon. Gentleman have raised are appropriate for investigation in the first instance not by the House but by the Select Committee on Members' Interests, which has been investigating some of them. That is the first place to which any such complaint should be referred.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Will the Leader of the House give some sympathetic consideration to the holding of a debate on the present circumstances of the United Kingdom's maritime industries? I refer in the main to shipping, shipbuilding, marine engineering and, of course, to the fishing industry. Many thousands of people employed in those industries genuinely believe that they, their industries and their communities face a bleak future. Hon. Members representing Scotland find the Scottish Grand Committee and Scottish Question Time a poor substitute for a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, especially when it comes to giving tough-minded scrutiny to Government policy on these and other industries. I urge the right hon. and learned Gentleman to accept the need for such a debate in the near future.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot undertake to arrange a debate on that topic in the near future, but I know that that question is of interest not only to Scottish Members but to hon. Members representing other parts of the country—not least because my Parliamentary Private Secretary represents a fishing constituency. I shall certainly bear the matter in mind.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Will the Leader of the House please arrange an early debate on the continuing, alarming and unacceptable increase in the crime rate, which, unfortunately, has been at its worst in the county of Leicestershire? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman bear in mind the fact that hon. Members of all parties, including particularly his hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham), have been pressing continually for years for proper policing in accordance with the wishes and requests of successive chief constables? It is not enough to declare a vague promise at the Tory party conference that the number of police will be increased. Hon. Members who represent Leicestershire on both sides of the House demand increased resources now before the crime rate gets even worse in our county.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. and learned Gentleman can be relied upon to overstate the case. He talks about vague promises at the Tory party conference. Everyone is concerned about the level of crime, and the fact is that under this Government there has been a massive increase——

Mr. Janner: A massive increase in crime.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There has been a massive increase in resources, including police officers in service, as a direct result of the Government's policies. Our concern has been expressed by actions rather than by words, at which the hon. and learned Gentleman is an expert.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Now that the economy has moved into recession, the unemployment figures have risen several months in succession, and bankruptcies and liquidations have trebled in the past year, why does not the Leader of the House arrange a debate on bankruptcies and the economy? We could not only discuss the massive unemployment that affects my hon. Friends' constituencies; we could also invite Tory Members to talk about the demise of Murdoch's empire, in which shares have fallen in value by two thirds this year, and the winding up of the Tory party's little Blue Rosette company with debts of £100,000, which meant that, at the Bournemouth conference, the Prime Minister's face had to be taken off every single mug?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I take note of the characteristically good-natured way in which the hon. Gentleman expresses his interest in the matter. He will surely appreciate that much of what happens to unemployment in the months ahead, as in the years past, depends on the attitude adopted by pay negotiators on both sides of the industry. I hope that he will lend his support to the cause of pay moderation.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Leader of the House recognise that the erosion of farm incomes in the hills and uplands of Scotland is catastrophic? Does he accept that there is an urgent need for a debate while the autumn review is pending, to enable hon. Members to bring their knowledge of the matter to the attention of responsible Ministers before decisions are taken, not only in Brussels but by our domestic Ministries, on the hill livestock compensatory allowance levels?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was in the House when I dealt with that point some time ago. The matter can be dealt with time and again. Of course there is anxiety on both sides of not only the House, but virtually every democratic assembly in the industrialised world about the state of the farming industry. It is caused by the manifest capacity to produce surpluses, which is not mitigated by the existence of massive protection. It is for that reason that the Government have taken and are taking the lead in the necessary worldwide reform of agricultural protection. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has kept the House fully informed of the results of his work and will continue to do so.

Points of Order

4.15 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): On a point or order, Mr. Speaker. May I seek your advice and guidance? During Prime Minister's Question Time today, the Prime Minister, in a somewhat hysterical outburst, referred clearly to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition as a crypto-communist. Those words were not only clearly overheard, but are in the preliminary draft of the Official Report. Since they were uttered, I have had the opportunity to consult "Erskine May", which on page 381 makes it clear that is unparliamentary language. I assume that the rules on unparliamentary language apply even to the Prime Minister. I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, can advise me how that totally dishonest and abusive smear of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition—[Interruption.] There would be very different noises on the other side of the House if the position were reversed. We are not prepared to accept one set of rules for the rabble over there and another set for my hon. Friends. Can you advise me, Mr. Speaker, how the Prime Minister can be caused to remove those words from the record and how we can have Hansard put straight?

"the imputation of false or unavowed motives"

Mr. Speaker: This is not the moment for points of order but since it has been raised I will deal with it. As far as I am aware, the word "communist" has never been considered unparliamentary. In any case, I am afraid that I did not hear the last part of that sentence——

Dr. Cunningham: It is in the record.

Mr. Speaker: It may be in the record, but there was a great deal of noise. I recollect that when the Leader of the Opposition rose he appeared to be laughing heartily. I did not hear the remark, but such matters should be raised immediately in order that they can be dealt with by the Chair.

Dr. Cunningham: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rest my case on "Erskine May" which says on page 381: to a Member is unparliamentary. It is absolutely unacceptable for the Prime Minister to get away with smearing the Leader of the Opposition in this way.

"The imputation of false or unavowed motives"

Mr. Speaker: If I had heard the expression, I would have stopped it. I am surprised that the issue was not raised immediately at the time if anyone else heard it. I did not hear the Prime Minister make a personal accusation against the integrity of the Leader of the Opposition in that exchange. I cannot do anything about it now, but I am sure that the matter will be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister and she will make amends.

Dr. Cunningham: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. What you are really saying is that on some future occasion we can refer to the Prime Minister as a crypto-fascist and that that will be in order.

Mr. Speaker: I hope that we shall always treat each other with respect. Sadly at Prime Minister's Question Time there is frequently a great deal of noise and it is not possible for us all to hear exactly what is said. I did not hear the expression. If other hon. Members heard it and felt aggrieved about it, I am genuinely surprised that they did not get up to draw it to my attention immediately.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. We all heard the Leader of the Opposition utter crude and uncouth abuse at the Prime Minister. If the Opposition do not like it being dished out, they should not dish it out in the first place.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have just driven back from the by-election at Eastbourne and I heard clearly on the car radio the term "crypto-communist". Therefore, the nation heard it. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that two years ago a complaint was made by a Conservative Member about a reference to fascism made by one of my hon. Friends. On that occasion my hon. Friend was required to withdraw that statement. May we simply ask——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman had been in the House instead of driving in his car, he would have had an opportunity to raise the matter with me at the time. The whole House knows that I deprecate the use of such phrases. I required the term "fascist" to be withdrawn on that occasion because I heard it. Today, unfortunately, I was not driving in my car and I did not hear it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Allow me to reflect upon the matter to see what can be done.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While you are reflecting on the matter you might bear in mind that representations have been made in the past; for instance, when I called Dr. Death a pompous sod, I had to take an early bath. When I said that the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) had been lining his pockets because he got an non-executive directorship of British Telecom, I had an early bath. In this quaint little place you have different rules for different people.

Mr. Speaker: I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not want another one.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it on the same matter?

Mr. Trimble: Yes, it is. I just wondered, now that we have the cameras in this place, whether it would be appropriate to have action replays. You could then be sure of exactly what was said.

Mr. Speaker: The cameras are a large part of the trouble really.

Seven-Year-Olds (Testing)

4.20 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. John MacGregor): Following discussions with and advice from the School Examinations and Assessment Council, the Secretary of State for Wales and I have today decided on the scope of the tests to be used in the first national assessments of all seven-year-olds in 1991. I am arranging for copies of the specification for drawing up the actual tests themselves to be placed in the Library of the House.

The national tests will concentrate on what is of key concern to parents—reading, writing, arithmetic and basic scientific skills. Because the ability to read is vital to pupils' future development, all seven-year-olds will be tested separately on their ability to read. To help ensure consistency of standards, that test will be based on a range of common texts.

I believe that it is important that at this age the tests concentrate on the basics. That is not only right in itself, but means tests that will be manageable in the classrooms. The tests will take up the equivalent of about a week and a half of classroom time in the first half of the summer term. The message from this summer's pilot tests was that they overloaded the schools. I have decided that next year's tests will be simpler and will concentrate on what really matters. In addition to the external tests, teachers will also carry out their own tests of all seven-year-olds across all aspects of English, maths and science in the national curriculum.

For the first time, we shall have a national system in all schools which will enable parents and teachers to know how their children are progressing in the basics of education. All parents will be able to get clear and objective results and to talk to teachers about their children's progress. For each child, teachers will be able to build upon strengths and tackle weaknesses.

The national curriculum sets clear and demanding national targets for pupils of all ages and abilities in English, mathematics and science. The tests will show how pupils—individually and collectively—are measuring up to those targets. For the first time, we shall have clear, national information about what is happening to standards. The arrangements that I am announcing today for testing seven-year-olds are the key to raising those standards.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this afternoon's announcement represents a major and humiliating U-turn—[Interruption.] I appreciate why Conservative Members do not like that news, but it is true. It represents a major and humiliating U-turn by the Prime Minister and the Cabinet against the whole concept of the national curriculum and testing contained in the Education Reform Act 1988.

Is it because the Secretary of State understands the extent of the Government's embarrassment that, as the Order Paper makes clear, his original intention was to slip out this announcement by way of a written answer and that this oral statement had to be wrung from him?

The Secretary of State must know that the Labour party and virtually everyone else told his predecessor, now the chairman of the Conservative party, that the national curriculum was too inflexible and that the complex testing of seven-year-olds—for which every Conservative Member voted—in English, maths, science, history, geography, technology, music, art and physical education was not only ludicrously impractical but would seriously damage the education of a great many children.

Is not it a sign of the Government's profound arrogance that they refused to listen and instead have subjected teachers and other people's children to three years of experimentation, while of course ensuring that their own children, in private schools, remain immune from the national curriculum and therefore from this chaos? Against that background, is it any wonder that public confidence in the Government's handling of education and in the Secretary of State has never been lower since the last world war?

If, as a junior education Minister said in July, the pilots were too unwieldy, and if, as the Secretary of State has admitted today, they caused an overload to the curriculum, why did Ministers allow them to go ahead, since others told them clearly in advance what the consequences of those pilots would be? How much has this experimentation with other people's children cost the taxpayer? How many million sheets of paper have been wasted? How much has teachers' morale been damaged?

In contrast to the confusion of the Government's position, Labour has always been clear. We have sought tests in basic subjects such as reading, writing, maths and science as an aid to raising standards, to diagnose children's strengths and weaknesses and to help provide information about the performance of schools. We shall judge this afternoon's proposals by those criteria, and for that reason we welcome the separate reading test, which is long overdue.

What will be the cost of these proposals for testing? Who will prepare and evaluate the tests? What will be the link between these tests and the national curriculum? What will be the status of the separate teacher tests in relation to the standard assessment tasks?

There have been a good many suggestions in the newspapers that the tests announced by the right hon. Gentleman today cannot be in place in all schools by the summer of 1991. Can he guarantee that that will not be the case?

At the beginning of his statement, the Secretary of State said that he had received advice from the School Examinations and Assessment Council. Did he accept that advice—and, if not, to what extent did he depart from it? Will he also explain the exact status of the document entitled "Specification for the Development of Standard Assessment Tasks in the Core Subjects"? Is it to be the basis of the proposals for contracts for the new tests? What additional support will schools be given to help children when strengths are noted or weaknesses diagnosed?

The Secretary of State speaks of standards, but he must know that maths standards have fallen and that that has coincided with a decline in the number of properly qualified maths teachers. He must also know that there is evidence that reading standards may have fallen, but the Government abandoned the national monitoring of reading standards in 1988 and cannot say whether they have gone up or down. Furthermore, it is simply untrue for the right hon. Gentleman to say that, for the first time, we shall have clear national information about what is happening to standards, when we were already receiving that information from the Assessment of Performance

[Mr. Jack Straw]

Unit, established in 1975—and abolished by the present Government in 1988, with the consequence that the monitoring of reading standards ceased.

Given the continuing confusion and continual changes in regard to the national curriculum, does the Secretary of State agree that he must now publish a comprehensive White Paper on testing in the national curriculum, setting out exactly what the Government expect of schools, pupils and teachers and how these changes are intended to raise standards?

From the retreat that the statement represents, is not it clear that our children and our schools have paid a high price for that near-lethal combination of doctrinaire intransigence and administrative incompetence which is the hallmark of the Government's education policies?

Mr. MacGregor: That is the biggest load of nonsense that I have heard in a long time. I am astonished at the attempts by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) to build bricks out of air—[HON. MEMBERS: "Straw!"] No, there was not even any straw there.

Let me deal first with the points that the hon. Gentleman made about standards. When he spoke about maths standards falling, he entirely neglected the fact that assessments made between 1982 and 1987 showed that in a number of areas maths standards had actually improved. When he draws our attention to an area in which standards may have dropped, the hon. Gentleman does not mention all the areas in which they may have improved much more than they have dropped.

By constantly harping on the aspects that still need to be improved in schools—and, of course, improvements will always be necessary—the hon. Gentleman destroys the confidence of the many good teachers who are doing so much to raise standards. That is already happening with the national curriculum.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned reading standards, but the evidence in that regard is not clear; those who presented it described it as prima facie and not certain. We do not know whether reading standards have fallen in some cases, although I am taking steps to check the figures nationally. But, if they have—here I choose my words with care—it is nothing to do with teaching resources; it is to do with certain teaching methods introduced by socialist educational practices and philosophies. If there was indeed a decline earlier in the decade, it was due to that approach.

The hon. Gentleman is way off beam when he talks about a U-turn. We are introducing the most carefully prepared educational reforms that have been carried out for a long time: that is why the advisory body's pilot projects were undertaken. My predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), said from the outset that the assessment of seven-year-olds would consist of a combination of external tests and teacher assessments. For the past two years we have been undertaking pilot schemes to ensure that we get the balance right. That was the whole point of the pilot project.

During the summer I said that I believed that the pilot schemes undertaken by agencies developing the tests showed that the system was overloaded. I could see that that was the case and I made that clear early on. However, big benefits have been gained from the pilot schemes, apart from our being enabled to reach these decisions. A great deal of work has gone into developing the tests, which we shall use for seven-year-olds within the national curriculum, and experience has been gained from the pilot tests.

The hon. Member asked about the cost of the scheme. Much of the cost of the schemes intended to be undertaken in schools next summer will be within their normal expenditure. Through specific grants this year I have supported a total expenditure of about £35 million for assessment in the coming year.

The hon. Gentleman's next question was about who will prepare and evaluate tests. The School Examinations and Assessment Council will now go out to tender to agencies to draw up the tests. The evaluation will be done by SEAC.

I am astonished that the hon. Member for Blackburn does not understand the link between the tests and the national curriculum. The curriculum is all about raising standards and extending the range of education. Assessment and tests will be linked with the development of the national curriculum in the particular subjects—English, maths and science—that we shall be testing next summer.

I confirm that we shall be doing national testing in the summer of 1991, for the first time. As the national curriculum develops I expect that we shall learn that some things need to be changed. The hon. Member for Blackburn shows an astonishing ignorance of how these things are done if he expects everything to be absolutely right from day one. We shall continue to develop on the basis of experience. The reason for carrying out the pilot tests was to learn from two years' experience before we tested nationally for the first time. We have concentrated the tests on certain areas, but we have not changed their nature.

The hon. Member asked about the specification that has been drawn up for developing tests, which will go to the agencies. It also contains information for teachers, although a great deal more information and training for teachers will be provided in the early part of next year.

I am simply astonished at the hon. Gentleman's charges this afternoon. We are carrying out precisely what we said we would do at the beginning: raising standards with national testing for all seven-year-olds as a basis. The tests have been based on the most careful evaluation of the pilot tests in the past two years.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his announcement will be widely welcomed by parents? Can he confirm that the tests will be sufficiently rigorous to ensure that any shortcomings in a child's education can be identified quickly? Does he agree that if there is a problem with a child's education the quicker that it is identified, the sooner it can be put right, to the benefit of that child's further education?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. That is one of the main purposes of assessment and testing. Yes, the tests will be rigorous, stimulating, imaginative and they will be external—the child will not see them in the classroom beforehand.

Above all, the tests will enable the teacher to assess the pupil's ability and to identify weaknesses, and they will enable the parents to know what level the child has reached. It is a more systematic way of ensuring that children have the benefit of such an approach in all schools.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): My colleagues and I welcome the Secretary of State's announcement, and his decision to abandon the more complex and unworkable proposals envisaged by his predecessor. This scheme is a great improvement. However, will not parents be much more concerned about what the tests show than the fact there are tests? Is not the reality that, in more than 10 years of Tory Government, standards in literacy and numeracy have fallen dramatically in many areas? Is not the key question what will be done about standards and resourcing education so that they rise, which is much more important than what sort of tests we have, although they will be helpful in proving just how badly off and badly educated some of our young people are?

Mr. MacGregor: I reject absolutely the charge that what I am doing is different from that which was envisaged by my predecessor. What he so rightly set in train were pilots and work done by specialists to develop the basic concepts of the national curriculum and to carry them through into testing. As a result of what they did during the summer, we have learnt that the way in which they were trying to develop the tests was too cumbersome. What they were doing, for example—this is very much a technical matter—was to ask the teachers in all the classrooms where pilots were undertaken this summer to start the children at level one, and if they passed that, to let them go on to level two, and then, if they passed level two, to go on to level three. The teachers know broadly the level at which children come in. Therefore, it makes much more sense to go straight to the level that the teacher thinks is right and then, if the tests prove that to be wrong, to drop back or to go forward. That is a technical point, but it led to overloading and to too cumbersome tests this summer.

That was my conclusion after studying the results of the pilots undertaken by the educational advisers. I reject absolutely the charge that what I am doing is different from what was envisaged by my predecessor. I am sure that he would have come to the same conclusion as I.

The hon. Gentleman must surely acknowledge that standards of literacy and numeracy and many other standards have risen sharply during the past 10 years. That is why many more children are taking GCSE and A-levels and getting better grades, and that is why many more young people are going into higher education.

Mr. Timothy Raison (Aylesbury): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his announcement most emphatically does not represent a retreat but a very important advance? Is he also aware that there is widespread appreciation of the great thoughtfulness and care with which he has approached the matter? That is crucial if we are to establish higher standards in British education.

Mr. MacGregor: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend. He knows a great deal about these matters. I agree with him. I believe that this will strengthen the national curriculum because it concentrates the standard assessment tasks—the external tests—on subjects that really matter and which concern parents. It will enable teachers to carry out assessment in other subjects. I am sure that it is the right way to proceed. We have learnt from the pilots that were conducted by the education experts that the system was overloaded and cumbersome in the classroom. I believe that we have now got it right. That is the point of pilots and experiments.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): I am sure that the Minister will be aware that teachers will greet his statement with a great sense of relief. Is there, however, any school in England or Wales in which the scheme that is to be adopted has been tested? What is to happen in schools where Welsh is the first language? I notice that the Minister of State, Welsh Office is here today. Are we to have a brief statement from him about that? Many parents in Wales will want to know what is to happen.

Mr. MacGregor: During the summer I talked to large numbers of teachers, including those doing the pilots, and found that there was a warm response to the tests. They felt that the tests had been imaginatively developed. We shall be building on them for the full national testing next summer. The tests already carried out have resulted in a positive benefit, and we shall build on them. The teachers found themselves in difficulties because there were too many tests. Overloading was the real problem. Among other things, it made management of the classroom during the period of the tests very difficult. That is what the teachers, including the National Association of Head Teachers, came to talk to me about.

We have all been evaluating the pilots. I repeat again that that is the point of pilots. During the past year we have tested the tests. On that basis, we can test the pupils next year. During the summer the teachers dealt with this admirably and did everything that they could to make sure that the pilots were worth while. Therefore, I am sure that they will welcome the statement that I have made today.

As for the hon. Gentleman's question about the Welsh language, the standard assessment task material to assess Welsh in Welsh-medium schools will be available to teachers next year, but the first statutory requirement to assess the language will be in 1992.

Sir Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North): I welcome the Secretary of State's statement. I am sure that an overwhelming number of teachers will welcome this simplification. They are worried about the layer after layer. This is, therefore, a sensible proposal.

My right hon. Friend's statement was admirably short. Let us hope that the examinations will also be admirably short. We are talking about a week and a half. The much-maligned 11-plus took one morning. I do not see why the examinations cannot be carried out within a day, or half a day. I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider cutting the time down even further.

I have considerable sympathy with teachers who feel that if one called a meeting of six classroom infant school teachers and six infant school heads, chosen at random from a list of teachers, and brought them together for a day, they could solve all these difficulties by drawing the tests up themselves, instead of leaving it to the educational establishment which did so much to destroy standards and which is still playing around with all these wrong ideas.

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his opening remarks. We are being very thorough over the tests for children aged seven. We are testing a wide range of knowledge, skills, understanding and practical application. Children will be tested individually. Most of the tests will be written tests. Reading tests have to go far beyond one and a half weeks. They have to be done individually with each child. There will be a thorough and wide range of tests. It will be impossible to carry them out in half a day.

Teachers have been involved in drawing up the tests. The tests that have been carried out up to now were used in some local authorities but not in others. They did not apply to the whole of the national curriculum. It was necessary, therefore, to build on them in order to develop a wider range of tests for the national curriculum. I hope that my right hon. Friend will find that the tests are practical and rigorous. The tests will be external and I am sure that they are the kind of things that he would want us to do.

Mrs. Rosie Barnes (Greenwich): I welcome the proposals for testing seven-year-olds, so long as they are carried out sensitively and constructively and are never used to brand such young children as failures. However, the purpose of the tests is to identify specific needs—both strengths and learning difficulties. Unless we can be reassured that adequate resources will be made available to meet those identified needs, the tests will not be worth while. At the moment many children who have been identified as having special needs—I include children with strengths as well as those with difficulties—have to wait far too long for far too little.

Mr. MacGregor: The whole point of testing at seven is to summarise for parents and teachers the stage that a child has reached at the end of its time at an infant school. It will enable teachers to assess weaknesses and the areas in which further work needs to be done with that child. Children will be graded at different levels. It is a process of, among many other things, identifying special needs.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): I welcome the simplified tests, but does my right hon. Friend think that they will have an effect on the way in which the national curriculum is taught at primary stage in schools? Does he agree that at present the national curriculum gives children a broad level of information instead of concentrating on basic skills? Will not these changes inevitably mean, therefore, changes to the way in which the curriculum is introduced?

Mr. MacGregor: The national curriculum is all about obtaining a broader range of knowledge and skills from the age of five to 16. I believe strongly that that is necessary if we are to have an education system for all our children relevant for the 1990s and beyond. A broad range of skills and the understanding and knowledge of practical application are all important. My announcement about concentrating the external tests on the basics—reading, writing, arithmetic and basic scientific skills—means that the tests will deal with matters about which parents are most concerned.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): The Secretary of State spoke of testing as a method of improving standards. It is teaching which improves standards, not testing. The time spent in testing is time taken from teaching. I do not believe that there is a school in the country where children are not regularly tested so that the teacher knows how well they are absorbing what is being taught. There is a case for trying to standardise tests, particularly in mathematics, but does the Secretary of State agree that when devising the tests it must be remembered that a child who is allowed to play with balancing apparatus at an early stage will understand quadratic equations easily later on, but may not do well in formal arithmetic tests, which will be no prediction of future standards or ability? Does the Secretary of State agree that the tests must be——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Lady, but will she ask her question because there is an important debate after this?

Ms. Gordon: Does the Secretary of State agree that it is important that the tests take into account cultural differences, class differences and ethnic minority differences so that the results will not be unfair? Does he agree that the external aspect of testing can be very damaging to children aged seven? It can destroy the self-image of many children who are not able to succeed. The tests must be devised so that children can succeed, because success lays the pathway to future improvement in education.

Mr. MacGregor: It is important to have assessment and testing at the ages of seven, 11 and 14 as well as at 16. It is important so that teachers can assess the progress of the child, so that parents can know what is going on and so that, nationally, we all know the progress that is being made. Therefore, I make no apology for introducing tests and assessments at seven, 11 and 14. There will be a wide range of ways in which the assessment is made. The reaction from the majority of the teaching profession to the national curriculum and concept of assessment has been very favourable. We are introducing a systematic means of checking what children have learnt, checking the results and assessing their progress.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must have regard to the important Public Accounts Committee debate that will take place immediately after this statement. I understand the importance of this subject and I know that many hon. Members wish to participate. If they are brief, I hope to be able to fit them all in, but I shall have to stop questions to the Secretary of State at 5.10 pm. Therefore, I ask for brief questions now.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I welcome the clear guidelines for testing at seven set out by my right hon. Friend. I wonder whether Members of Parliament would achieve good scores if they were allowed to take the test. I should like to ask two clear questions——

Mr. Speaker: Order. How about asking one question? That will give other hon. Members a chance.

Mr. Greenway: Will the test include the spelling of words learnt phonically by children? That will be important. Is my right hon. Friend aware that if teachers are to be asked to spend one and a half weeks testing, it will have serious implications for staff time? They will need help and someone to take the class while they are doing the testing. What will be done?

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, spelling is included. It is one of the eight attainment targets outside reading. On my hon.

Friend's second point, testing will be one and a half weeks carried out over three weeks. We believe that that is manageable.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I and my colleagues also welcome the Secretary of State's statement. We welcome the reduced scope of the tests which will make them more manageable for children and reduce the heavy load on teachers. I see that the assessments will be introduced in 1991. Will the tests come into operation in Northern Ireland in 1991?

The Secretary of State is referring to national assessments and one wonders sometimes to what nation he is referring. Statements of this nature should be made on a United Kingdom basis, not just an England and Wales basis. The Parliament of England and Wales went out of existence nearly 300 years ago.

Mr. MacGregor: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I am responsible for education in England. I shall check up on the points he has raised and ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland gets in touch with the hon. Gentleman about it.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his positive statement with its emphasis on diagnostic testing of pupils and improving quality and standards contrasts with the destructive and negative attitude of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw)? It is the same negative attitude that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues exhibited a few months ago when they repeated the allegation—now proved to be untrue—in the National Union of Teachers' advertisements about the quality of our schools which did a great deal to damage morale among teachers.

Mr. MacGregor: I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Can the Secretary of State say what consideration, allowances or weighting will be given to children of seven who take the test but whose first language is not English and to teachers whose first language is English?

On the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon), unless these matters are dealt with in an extremely sensitive way, there is a danger that both children and parents will have their self-esteem damaged. I suspect that some of this may be connected with the recent statement to allow first and primary schools to opt out. If children and their parents become greatly dissatisfied, there will be pressure to opt out of the maintained system.

Mr. MacGregor: This has nothing to do with my recent announcement about extending the option of grant-maintained status to all primary schools. That stands supremely on its own merits. On assessment, the hon. Gentleman should recognise that the approach of the national curriculum is that children reach different levels of attainment in different age groups. Some children will reach a certain level at a different time from others. Next summer, in the assessments at seven, there will be three levels—first, second and third. The point is to show parents and teachers what level a child has reached in a certain subject. It may vary from subject to subject. It will show what needs to be done to help the child move to the next stage. It is a means by which a child can assess its own progress.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): Will my right hon. Friend give me an absolute assurance that the levels of attainment in the tests will equal or surpass those achieved currently in the best systems on the continent? In other words, can he assure me that this will not prove to be another example of the insular complacency that has afflicted our system? If he can give me that assurance, will he explain how it will be achieved, given that on the continent there is a far more advanced and extensive system of nursery education? At the end of the road, whether it is mathematics or English, we want A-levels. Although we have confidence in the Secretary of State, we do not have confidence in the education industry. That is why vice-chancellors are saying that they will need a fourth year at university for mathematics and it is why A-level English is being diluted, despite my right hon. Friend's assurance to the contrary.

Mr. MacGregor: It is my intention to ensure that we have rigour in the tests. Although it is a different approach from some that take place in other countries, I am determined that we should achieve that rigour. On nursery education, my hon. Friend will know that we start full-time compulsory schooling at an earlier age than most countries in the European Community. That must be taken into account.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): About five minutes ago the Secretary of State said that over the past 18 months he has been testing the tests. Will he also accept that he has been testing the practicality of the dafter ideas of his predecessor, now the chairman of the Conservative party, whose tests and practicality have been found severely wanting? Will he accept that the longer his predecessor stays as Conservative party chairman, the happier we will be, since he cannot do any damage to the nation's children or to us?

Mr. MacGregor: That is nonsense. My right hon. Friend had the good sense to ensure that we ran pilots before setting up a national testing arrangement. We did two years of evaluation, from which we learned much. It is to my right hon. Friend's credit that he set up a system under which we now have the most careful preparation for radical education reforms that I can recall. The hon. Gentleman misses the point of testing tests and evaluation in a small number of primary schools before we go national.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the two great tests that his statement has passed? First, it will give parents an answer to the objective question "How is my child doing in school?" and, secondly, he has clearly listened and responded to the hard-working and professional teachers, who have given him and his colleagues advice on how to handle this matter. He has shown that he has heard them and has been able to agree with their professional judgment.

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): Does the Minister agree that testing is educationally sound if it establishes a child's problems and allows remedial action to be taken? Testing can be bad if it is done simply to fill files and, in many cases, to act as PR material for a school or school authority. Will the Minister insist and be emphatic that these tests will not be allowed to be used as PR exercises by a school or education authority?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree that one of the points of assessment at seven is to enable evaluation of the child, his progress and the areas that must be tackled because he is showing weakness in them. Equally, it is perfectly reasonable and right—indeed, I would encourage it—for schools to state, if they wish to do so, and we are not making it compulsory next year, what they are achieving in terms of assessment. Two matters are important in helping to raise standards: first, greater choice, which we are achieving under several of our other reforms and, secondly, comparative performance and encouraging schools that perhaps are not doing as well as others to follow schools that are. That is achieved by showing what is going on in the school.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the children who undertook the pilot tests enjoyed them and found them useful? How does he propose to adapt the testing procedures to schools which deal with children who have special learning difficulties but which are also applying the national curriculum to their work?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend's second point is obviously for experts on the subject and I look to SEAC and the agencies it uses to assist with that. It was clear that teachers and pupils found the individual tests stimulating. It was important that they were rigorous, but they found them stimulating. The problem was that there were too many tests.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As I have been a weekly columnist for the New Scientist for 23 years, will the Secretary of State accept that among the scientific community there is sceptical curiosity about testing at seven for basic scientific skills? If John or Jane aged seven seem to fall down on the testing of basic skills in science, what happens? Does anybody try to help them? Do we have the resources to try to help them or is there a danger of simply breaking their hearts and doing nothing about it?

Mr. MacGregor: The purpose of testing is the exploration of science and scientific concepts at a level appropriate for seven-year-olds. I have seen some very good work being done in schools. Criticism has been made that we have not had enough scientific teaching at the appropriate level in our primary schools, just as we have not had enough technology teaching in the past. That is a valid criticism. We are making great improvements and the scientific community welcomes the fact that such heavy emphasis is placed on science in the curriculum.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I welcome the concentration in my right hon. Friend's announcement on the three Rs, which is precisely the subject of parental concern at present. Will he ensure that the results of testing are issued in a manner that parents can understand by cutting out the education jargon that afflicts so much of these reports? We should bear it in mind that the very parents who will be reading the reports are those who had trouble with the three Rs in the first place.

Mr. MacGregor: By no means always, but I agree with the main point that my hon. Friend is making. One of the dangers of the education world is that it is riddled with technical and educational jargon. It is extremely important that reports to parents are written in clear language and in a way to which parents can respond. I share my hon. Friend's concern and will try to ensure that happens.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will these arrangements apply to the private sector, or will Tory Members' children be exempt from the provisions of testing, as they are exempt from the provisions of the national curriculum? How will he prevent the seven-year-old examinations being turned into a seven-plus procedure, with all the accompanying difficulties for the children involved? Would not it be better, rather than lavishing millions of pounds on this system, to lavish millions of pounds on more teachers to get smaller classes, because that is the only way that we shall achieve better standards?

Mr. MacGregor: Parliament decided, as the hon. Gentleman knows, that independent schools should not be brought within the national curriculum. There is pretty rigorous testing in many independent schools at various ages. As I have made clear many times, I hope that more and more will use the national curriculum.

Mr. Cryer: They do not have to.

Mr. MacGregor: No. Under the legislation they do not have to do so, but I believe that more will wish to participate fully in the national curriculum and I will welcome that.

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): May I welcome my right hon. Friend's concentration on the three Rs but particularly concentrate on reading? Will he assure me that the test will be sufficiently diagnostic that it will detect children suffering from dyslexia so that they are not branded as backward in reading and writing? It is of particular importance because I am afraid that a number of teachers do not accept that such a condition exists.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think that that will follow entirely from the assessment at seven, but the assessment of reading will detect children who continue to have reading difficulties, and it will do so on an externally assessed basis. In other words, the tests will be external. That will enable the teachers to identify children who have reading difficulties, which obviously they will be able to do in many other ways.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I congratulate my right hon. Friend, who has scored a great victory for common sense in his proposals. Many of us will see it as a victory over that part of the education establishment that seemed determined to undermine the Education Reform Act 1988. May we hope that in future announcements on tests he will follow the same policy as he has in today's statement? Will he consider the amounts that we pay those in the education service who advise, write and talk but do not teach, and concentrate more effort in the classroom, where the money is needed?

Mr. MacGregor: I have been evaluating carefully and discussing testing with many people. I have been evaluating the reaction of teachers who have been conscientiously doing the pilots. I have been discussing for some time with my official advisory body, the School Examinations and Assessment Council, and others what lessons we had learnt from the pilots and what decisions I should take. I believe that the decisions that I have taken, based on the advice of the School Examinations and Assessment Council, which is responsible for carrying this through, are absolutely right for the national curriculum. They will ensure that the national curriculum is carried through as we wish. They concentrate on the basics, which is important at the age of seven, and, for the first time, introduce across the country the concept of external tests. That is why I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the remarks that he made about the decisions that I have taken this afternoon.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): As a former teacher, I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement. It is good news that we are to make progress on testing in 1991. If we are to have a proper compulsory national system of testing of children, with a view to helping those in difficulties and raising overall standards, why cannot we have a proper compulsory national system of testing teachers, with the same objectives?

Mr. MacGregor: I have made it clear that I believe that teacher appraisal is desirable. I am trying to put in place a national framework for teacher appraisal. I do not think that it is right at the moment to move to statutory, compulsory, obligatory appraisal systems in every school, for the simple reason that the key priority at the moment is to get the national curriculum in place and to make those reforms work. I have been conscious of the hard work that many schools are doing in that respect. I do not want to overload the system at a time when we must make the national curriculum work. Many schools have been carrying out appraisals, and I have encouraged that.

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that he will reject the calls of those who wish individual tests for children to be made so variable, for a variety of reasons, that children's weaknesses may not be exposed or may be excused? Unless children have objective targets at which to aim, whatever their backgrounds may be, we will be selling them short. Will my right hon. Friend make it clear to parents and teachers that these tests are only one way of looking at a school, that many other components make a good school and that tests should be seen in the context of whatever else is done in a school? Teachers must recognise that tests are important, but parents must also recognise that there are other components on which to make a judgment.

Mr. MacGregor: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The whole point of introducing these external tests is to get the right balance between teacher assessment and external tests. The external tests bring in rigour and uniformity and give parents a much greater guarantee about the progress being made on the basics. It is important to strike the right balance, which is what I think we are doing. I agree with my hon. Friend that many aspects in a school are relevant to a school's performance, as well as what we have been talking about this afternoon.

Public Accounts

5.11 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the 34th to 41st Reports of the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 1988-89, of the 1st to 32nd Reports of Session 1989-90, and of the Treasury Minutes and Northern Ireland Department of finance and Personnel Memoranda on those Reports (Cm. 963, 964, 1057, 1101, 1150, 1235 and 1247) with particular reference to the following Reports:

Thirty-sixth, Further matters relating to Northern Ireland;

1989-90

First, Financial problems at universities;
Sixth, Sale of rover Group to British Aerospace plc;
Thirteenth, Ministry of Defence: Further examination of the Sale of Royal Ordnance plc;
Sixteenth, Financial Management in the National Health Service;
Thirty-first, Quality control of road and bridge construction.

The last public accounts debate was a little less than a year ago. We are moving to a tradition of holding over the debate for the overspill of the Session or shortly afterwards. The last motion referred to 48 reports; this time there are 40 reports and eight Government replies. We have chosen a few reports to highlight to which special attention should be drawn, although obviously many others will be mentioned during the debate.

My first task is to thank members of the hard-working Public Accounts Committee. Two Members no longer serve on the Committee. The first is Ian Gow, whose absence we greatly deplore. He carried out incisive questioning and was a valuable member of the Committee. All members of the Committee regret the occurrence that led to his departure from the Committee and the absence of his wise counsel during our investigations.

The other Member who is absent from the Committee is my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid). Like so many others, he has been moved to the Opposition Front Bench. A large number of Opposition Members on our Committee have moved to the Opposition Front Bench—my hon. Friends the Members for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam), for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) and for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers). It looks as though the Public Accounts Committee is fulfilling, on the Opposition Benches, the role that the Government Whips Office fulfils in recruiting to the Government Front Beench. This is a compliment and we value it, but we face some difficulties in finding replacements.

I welcome the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. He is always welcome. The roles of the Treasury and the Public Accounts Committee have several similarities. We are both anxious to get value for money and to ensure that taxpayers' money is used properly. We are grateful to the right hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley), who left the Committee in the last reshuffle.

The most important aspect of the Committee's work is unanimity. During the time I have had the privilege of being Chairman, there have been well over 300 reports, and every one has been unanimous. It is an enormous advantage to have unanimity. The Government have to take note of our reports, because hon. Members have come to identical conclusions. Our reports are not mushy. Some Committees can produce unanimous reports because they sink their differences in the ambiguity of wording. Members of the Public Accounts Committee are outspoken at the beginning of our discussions and at the end.

Unanimity is crucial. It comes from our respect for the taxpayer. We do not produce partisan views when we question witnesses and discuss reports. We have the enormous advantage that we do not look at policy. We take policy for granted, however much personally we may object to it. Policy is laid down. We want its economic, efficient and effective implementation. I have been pleased to see the large amount of work that my colleagues put into investigations. That was not always so. I am grateful for the investigations by my colleagues into certain matters, rather surprising the National Audit Office and me with their thoroughness.

The National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee are very much a partnership these days. The Committee depends on investigations by the National Audit Office, based as they are on detailed investigation of Government papers and accounts. We build on them with evidence from accounting officers and then produce reports for the House. Treasury minutes respond to our reports. We welcome the new form of Treasury minute, whereby each of our recommendations is followed by a response from a Government Department via the Treasury. Under the National Audit Act 1983, the Comptroller and Auditor General has complete discretion in the investigations that he undertakes. There is discussion with the Committee and our views are inserted in reports. We hear well in advance of matters that will be investigated.

I thank the Comptroller and Auditor General and his staff. The office has undoubtedly improved enormously since the days of the Exchequer and Audit Department. Previously, there were civil servants trying to be auditors; now, there are proper auditors. In fact, one of our problems is that the auditors have become so good that the City and other private enterprises want to take many of them. Because of the different rates of pay, a number of people leave the National Audit Office. However, because of interest in the job, its importance and the initiative that staff are allowed, we are able to retain people despite the rather lower levels of pay. We are grateful to them for all they do. We have meetings at the National Audit Office to see how they are progressing. The Public Accounts Committee is always a critical Committee, so we cannot be filled with uncritical admiration for them. Nevertheless, we are filled with admiration for the way in which they carry out improvements.

The Comptroller and Auditor-General for Northern Ireland, Bill Jack, and his staff, do a valuable job. I have chosen the Northern Ireland report as the first one to mention. I do not think that we have given it enough attention in our Committee debates. I am glad to see some Northern Ireland Members here, and I hope that they will comment in due course. The CAG for Northern Ireland makes his reports separately from the appropriation accounts, but there are some reports from the appropriation accounts. We do not have to wait for an annual publication, as reports are now published twice a year.

We also thank Treasury Officer of Accounts, John Beastall, and his Northern Ireland counterpart, John Dowdall, for their attendance at our sessions, and the accounting officers who come to give evidence. We are very much aware of the amount of time that they give in coming before us to give evidence. We know that they take their responsibilities in this seriously and that reputations can be made and —I hope rarely—unmade as a result of their failures or—which is far more common—their successes in dealing with public money.

The 36th report of 1988-89 is entitled "Further matters relating to Northern Ireland". Typically, we have about two investigative sessions a year and look at six or seven matters concerning Northern Ireland. I will concentrate on one matter, but to bring it into perspective, I will mention some of the matters that we have considered previously.

The most important was the De Lorean investigation some years ago. It led to our appreciation of the work done by the Northern Ireland Comptroller and Auditor-General. That report was fully up to the standard of anything that we have produced and led to some important matters. The Committee investigated the way in which the money was disposed of, which led to other interesting aspects.

We did not take evidence from either of the Ministers involved. Under the Labour Administration, one Minister started the whole process, and under the Conservative Administration, the other Minister gave substantial sums. The question was whether we should have them before us. I thought that it would be wrong to do so, and I still think that.

Under normal circumstances, we have the enormous advantage of looking at the issue, although we do not, of course, disqualify ourselves from hearing evidence from Ministers in future. However, when a Minister comes before us, personalities will play their part. Even more importantly, the Minister who started the process would be able to claim that it had not been continued in the way that he would have wished and the Minister who was involved at a later stage would say, "If only I had been there at the beginning, I would have handled it differently." We must avoid such a situation.

The person who always comes before us is the accounting officer of the day. He or she may be new to the post, but he or she holds the responsibility for the Department in the same way that the Financial Secretary will be responsible for his reply. Although he is fairly new to his position, I am sure that his reply will be interesting and we look forward to it. Our system provides the continuity of responsibility without which we could not sensibly operate. We have responsibility not for the people who come and go, but for the Department itself, so we are able to carry out proper investigations.

The De Lorean report led to various other matters, one of which was the role of the nominee directors. We found that there were nominee directors at a time when money was being passed over from the United States. We asked the Treasury what the role of a nominee director was and we had to wait an inordinate time for the answer. I cannot recall the exact time, but I know that it was six months or longer before we found out the answer.

Once one has raised such questions, one starts to wonder what the nominee directors are doing. There are a number of them in various industries. The Government appoint them and a nominee directorship is regarded as a bit of a perk in some quarters. One has to have someone quite good in the job, but one does not think of them as having the responsibility to inform the Government when things are going wrong, as they may often do. The rather light-hearted approach became a far more serious investigation and led to a further report.

A couple of years ago, we investigated road accident compensation. We found that pavements were being dug up—or something was happening—and that people were tripping over. Most of us have had a constituent who has made a claim after tripping up, but I can recall only a handful of such cases. Yet we found that in Northern Ireland there were streets in which there was a claim in almost every house. The following year, we asked how it was going, and we found that matters were worse.

Not so long ago, such matters were put out to private insurers. They thought that they could do a better job themselves, but they found that they were spending far more money on the claims. In one sense, it was not their fault, because the courts decided the amount of compensation. However, it is the responsibility of the Department of the Environment in Northern Ireland to ensure that the roads and pavements are kept up reasonably so that claims do not arise. We know about the problems in Northern Ireland as our colleagues tell us about them. We are also aware of them from the unfortunate statements that come all too frequently.

We understand that there are particular difficulties, but people in Northern Ireland, rightly, want the maintenance of the same standards that we expect in the rest of the United Kingdom. We do not make concessions on that, and it would be wrong to do so. I am sure that the Northern Ireland people feel the same as we do.

I want to refer again to the 36th report from 1988-89. In 1973, it was decided to promote a nursery to grow shrubs and plants for housing estates. That was a sensible proposition, as every housing estate needs plants and shrubs, and flowers would be needed for events such as lord mayors' functions. That happens in many local authorities in Great Britain.

It was decided that, instead of buying plants from outside, the nursery would grow them. The stock had to be valued at the end of each year and it was thought that as plants grow, they tend to be worth rather more at the end of each year than they are at the beginning. An average valuation of a 10 per cent. increase was put on each plant and shrub.

In March 1982, local government queries were raised and it was pointed out that plants vary. Some plants do not grow well, whereas others grow considerably and become far more valuable. A range of increase for each plant and shrub from about 10 per cent. to 40 per cent. was settled. Those that had done well would have an increase of 30 per cent. or 40 per cent. and those that had not done as well would have an increase of only 10 per cent.

Each year, the value of the small stock grew until it reached £570,000 in 1985. I am surprised that it did not happen earlier, but at that stage, several people began to find that a surprising figure. The nursery seemed to be a real profit centre. If it was doing so well, why did it not abandon the rigorous control of discretionary purchases and spend a little more on armchairs, desks or whatever? It was then decided that there should be an independent valuation, because £570,000 seemed such a large amount. An independent valuer was called in and valued the £570,000 of stock at £45,000. The problem was that people thought that the nursery had done well, but it had not.

The report says that the local government auditor was informed about the need for a more realistic stock valuation system. That was in place until the production of the figure of £570,000.

In question 4196 I asked:

"As a result of this over-assessment of the value of the stock what decisions were made which should not have been made? Was any expenditure incurred, for example, because they thought they were doing so well in making substantial sums of money?"

Obviously, that must affect the way in which the operation was carried out.

In the end, because of the difficulty of separating the fresh purchases from the old, it was decided to abandon the scheme. Sadly, people were dismissed. If it had been properly managed, it might well have been cost-effective.

In paragraphs 4 and 5 of the report, we say:

"It is clear that if at any time the Division directly responsible for the nursery had taken stock, or if the Finance Division had properly verified the figure for stock, the disparity between book and actual values would have immediately become apparent. We asked therefore why both Divisions failed to carry out these essential procedures and the Department replied that neither Division had sufficient knowledge of what was involved and that it could neither excuse nor justify these failures."

In paragraph 5 we say:

"We are astonished".

That is a word that I cannot ever recall using. The Public Accounts Committee's language is always restrained. We have a schedule of adjectives which has never gone as far as that. We understate. We are not putting people in the dock in order to sentence them to some horrible end; we are trying to improve the administration. That is crucial. Our task is to hear the evidence, not to indulge in attacking witnesses as they come before us.

I am reminded very much of the congressional system of inquiry, which many of us will have seen, where the chairman bangs his gavel and says that he has heard enough. It is easy to intimidate witnesses. That is not what we try to do. We try to discover the facts and to improve the administration. Nevertheless, in this case we had to say:

"We are astonished by these admissions and the confirmation that those responsible failed over a period of many years to carry out their fundamental duties."

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): The first parliamentary question that I tabled on my election here was on that very matter and I have a growing—if I may use that word—interest in it. The reality is that the dogs in the streets of Northern Ireland, even those visiting some of the trees, knew that something was wrong. That was drawn to the attention of Ministers here and the Housing Executive board, yet the matter was not finally dealt with until it was considered by the Public Accounts Committee, and that aspect of the matter still disturbs me.

Mr. Sheldon: I accept that the matter should have come to the Public Accounts Committee much earlier. It was only because of the Housing Executive's failure to undertake the sort of work that it should have done that prevented that happening.

In paragraph 8 we say:

[Mr. Sheldon]

"The C&AG referred not only to indadequate provision for plant deaths and the appreciation of non-existent stock as causes of the deficiency, but also to the unsatisfactory state of the nursery's stock records"— which does not surprise me—

"and the lack of control over the issue, receipt and custody of stock."

We go on to say in paragraph 10:

"We deplore the absence of basic, essential controls on the issue, receipt and custody of the nursery's stock and we note that it is probable that further, unquantified losses were incurred because the nursery was not cost-effective."

This is not a large sum of money in the national scene, but we often consider smaller matters because they highlight the way in which we should approach such problems.

In the end, because of the difficulty of separating the fresh purchases from the old, the sale price was much less than the valuation of £45,000. We could not find out exactly, because the records were not as good as they should have been. I went into the matter diligently, because I thought that it would be useful to discover how much of that £570,000 was returned in the sale. It was almost certainly less than £30,000, and it may even have been as little as £3,000. I have no knowledge of that, but it was certainly much less than the valuation, that we know.

The nursery has now closed down, but what happened is a warning not to ignore any aspects of one's work, even though they may not be central. They must all be made subject to the same kind of control as the larger and more important areas.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I accept the right hon. Gentleman's argument. Does he agree that, since the Comptroller and Auditor-General does not get the books until much later, he does an excellent job in the circumstances, and that that supports the argument that we have sought to lay before the House—that a Select Committee is needed to scrutinise at an early stage the different Departments' work in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Sheldon: I have no comment to make on that. My task is to take the policy for granted and to ensure that it is carried out in the most efficient, effective and economic manner.

That is our report, and I am sure that it was well received by those who wanted to see the problems of Northern Ireland brought into line with the situation in the United Kingdom. However, Northern Ireland is not alone in such misjudgments. I am sorry to say that we have a fair number, some of which I shall refer to.

The most important aspect of this is that we do not view with great pleasure the examination of matters which come before us where it is felt that inadequate action has been taken. As I said before, our task is to improve matters for the future.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): The right hon. Gentleman may be about to stress this, but in view of what he said about the Committee's careful language, which is absolutely right, it should be placed on record that the accounting officer himself in this case said, "They are appalling cases."

Mr. Sheldon: There is no question about that. We had the full support of the Departments in Northern Ireland. They learn a great deal from our work. A good accounting officer will usually welcome our investigation in so far as it justifies the action that he or she would wish to see in improving their own financial management. It is the kind of co-operation which we most importantly welcome, because it is that which leads to action being taken. If that were not the case, I am sure that we should be more extreme in our language. Government Departments have an interest in trying to improve the effective use of public expenditure; that is why they co-operate with us even though we may disagree, as we do strongly in a number of aspects.

The first paragraph of our first report 1989-90 entitled "Financial problems at universities" says:

"Following reductions in Government grant in the early 1980s, our predecessors in Session 1985-86 noted that continued financial constraints were expected to present universities with serious problems. This underlined the importance of sound financial management and the need for a review of the responsibilities of the University Grants Committee".

In paragraph 2(a), we say:

"We are greatly concerned at the serious financial mismanagement at University College, Cardiff in the period up to 1987. The breakdown of financial control, the attitude of those charged with proper stewardship of its funds and the disregard of proper procedures brought a major academic institution to the verge of insolvency."

That is most serious.

Paragraph 2(d) states:

"We believe strongly, however, that the UGC should have taken earlier and more positive action to identify, appraise and tackle the financial difficulties at Cardiff. They were well aware of the difficulties facing universities as a result of grant levels; and indeed they assured our predecessors that they would be discussing with universities exactly the sort of staffing problems that lay at the heart of Cardiff's troubles. We consider that they took too passive a role in concluding that they were unable to challenge the College's view that no staff reductions were necessary and that there would be no consequent financial problems."

In paragraph 2(e), we stated:

"We believe that the UGC's information systems left them too much in the dark about developing problems at universities; and we are concerned that their failure to take decisive action in the initial stages allowed the financial and other problems at the College to become more deeply entrenched and added to the eventual cost of rescuing it from insolvency. We also consider that the UGC made an error of judgment in not reporting these problems to Parliament in their annual survey at the first available opportunity."

In paragraph 2(g), we stated:

"we welcome the establishment of the new Universities Funding Council, with an expanded role, a more positive remit and greater powers and responsibilities."

In paragraph 2(h) we state:

"We expect the Council quickly to build up the planning arrangements, financial management and information systems, and the capacity for monitoring and analysis which are essential for the effective allocation and oversight of the grants to universities."

That is really the point. We found that there was a failure to get the financial management and information systems into place. There was not the monitoring or analysis that we believed was essential for the proper allocation and oversight of grants to universities.

We understand the severe problems and the reason why the Universities Funding Council involved itself rather less than it might have done. The council was conscious of the need for academic interference to be reduced to a minimum, but there is a difference between that and having responsibilities to ensure that universities are financially solvent and financially able to deal with their affairs. The council should be aware of that.

What is the point of a Universities Funding Council which does not know when a university is in trouble before that arises? After all, the council is giving grants and handing out money to universities. It should not hand out money without knowing what universities are doing.

In a subsequent investigation, the report of which has been published but is not before us today because we have not had a Government reply, it is clear that the funding task of the Universities Funding Council must be tied in with a knowledge of what is happening so that it at least can take action and perhaps tell a university that it needs more money or that it should be taking advice on how to reduce its commitments. We know that universities are in a tight financial position; speaking as an Opposition Member, I would have something to say about that, but that is not the role of the Public Accounts Committee. It is up to the Universities Funding Council to take the requisite action. We will consider that report in due course.

I want now to consider the sixth report of the Public Accounts Committee, entitled "Sale of Rover Group PLC to British Aerospace PLC". We have produced an interim report and we have not dealt with all the matters. We learned that, in 1975, Rover was facing bankruptcy and was taken into public ownership. In August 1988, the Government sold the 99·8 per cent. which they held to British Aerospace for £150 million after provision of £547 million in the light of Government debt and investment programme.

We examined the Department of Trade and Industry and its financial advisers, Baring Brothers, and we have produced an interim report which deals simply with the facts as we saw them. We are going to set out our conclusions and recommendations in a further report. All I intend to do now is to pose a number of the questions to which we hope to append conclusions after the Select Committee on Trade and Industry has completed its examination and we have taken the matter further. The questions are posed from our interim report.

Why was there not acceptance of competition to get the best price? That is obviously a matter of particular importance for the Public Accounts Committee, whose task is to get the best price in all privatisations or sales of Government assets so as to protect the taxpayer. There were four expressions of interest to control the Rover assets—from Ford, Volkswagen, Lonrho and Melton Medes. We asked the DTI why it decided that there would be no competition and that British Aerospace would have certain advantages at the beginning in examining and deciding whether it wanted to take the company over for a negotiated price.

We asked why

"the threat posed by competition more than outweighed the benefits of a limited competitive tender of the kind that they and Barings had initially been in favour of."

The Department replied that it

"recognised the advantage of competition in giving a benchmark against which to measure prices, but had concluded that a public auction would be damaging to the Company."

On that basis, we examined the Department in our taking of evidence. So far we, have no conclusions; I simply have questions and the Department's answers, which will lead to further questioning and conclusions later.

We asked Sir Peter Gregson, the permanent secretary to the Department of Trade and Industry:

"why did you not follow up the four other expressions of interest? There were four other companies that were interested in acquiring the Rover Group. Why did you not follow them up? . . . In the beginning you were prepared to take them whenever they came, but at the end you were only prepared to take them if the negotiations failed. There is a clear difference over time. Why was this? . . . How could a firm offer be made if you were not giving them information on which to base those offers?"

The House may recall that the information was not given to the other companies in the same way that it was given to British Aerospace.

Sir Peter Gregson replied:

"A company could have made an offer on the basis of publicly available information. If a company did not choose to do that and wished to have the kind of confidential information which could only be obtained in a negotiating situation then that company would have to wait until the exclusive negotiations had come to an end."

We asked about Mr. Baring's judgment about that, and he said in response to question No. 108:

"If we had been concerned simply to get the best price and if we had not been concerned with the possible risk of failure, if we were perhaps slightly less cautious than the Government appeared to have been in this case, then we would certainly have gone for the limited competitive tender."

I asked:

"So to get the best price, competitive tender was the route?"

The reply was:

"Yes, but it involved some risk."

That was the Government's view, and it will be examined further in due course.

At question 114, I asked about the valuation. The valuation was very important. We were concerned that an up-to-date, comprehensive valuation was not required. I said:

"But it was not a comprehensive valuation of all the assets and the earning potential of the Rover Group."

Sir Peter Gregson replied:

"I believe that the important consideration here was not the breakup value of this company but the profitability of the company. There was ample evidence of that. There really was not a great deal of point in assessing the value of the plant and sites in very great detail if the whole purpose of the disposal was that the plant and sites should continue on a productive basis."

I said:

"So you had neither competition, nor valuation and you went into negotiation with those elements lacking?"

Sir Peter Gregson replied:

"I would not accept that there was no valuation."

That was the problem. We have seen it in respect of several sales of assets. Perhaps one is selling an asset at a value which is subsequently worth more than one thought at the time. That has occurred again and again. One of the big advantages that we said that the Government should have was put originally by the hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) who used to be a member of the Public Accounts Committee and is now Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission. It played a part in almost every examination of the sale of public assets.

The hon. Member for Horsham asked why we were selling them all at one go. That somebody wishes to sell assets has nothing to do with the Public Accounts Committee. We are interested only in getting the best price available. We said, "If you sell them in tranches and you get it wrong, you may get it right subsequently." I instance, of course, the sale of gilts. At the beginning of the year, the figures are comparable, because the amount of money that the Government raise from the sale of gilts is roughly comparable to the amount of money that they are getting from the sale of their assets. I had dealings with the Government broker as I had certain responsibilities at one stage in my time at the Treasury. At the beginning of the year, one goes to the Government broker and discusses what is to be sold and for how much—£100 million, for example—and what sort of coupon there will be. It is planned throughout the year. One sees how the market is reacting, so one sells.

That is not the way in which these sales are conducted. We might have thought that the best way to do it would be to obtain somebody with appropriate expertise. If we are to embark on the sale of assets, we should have someone with special expertise rather than the ad hoc arrangements that were made. However, that has gone now. We need to think in terms of trying to get the best price. If we fail, at least some further amounts may be obtained later. One of the problems is that the Treasury likes to know at the beginning how much it will get throughout the year. That is a limiting factor. It is much more important to protect the taxpayer, and that is obviously the Committee's task.

Another aspect is clawbacks. I shall refer to them in respect of the Royal Ordnance plc. If one sells something, it could be difficult to get a proper valuation. I understand the difficulties, particularly in valuing land. At least if there is a clause that we can share—not take over—in the unexpected sums of money that might be realised, which is also important, we can protect the public interest.

Some people say, "You will not be able to do that easily, because it will depress the value of the shares." Public money is different from private money. Somebody in a private company can take chances and so on, but when it comes to dealing with public money, there must be confidence that one is getting the best price for assets. There is an obligation upon all of us—not just the Public Accounts Committee—to make sure that the public feel that they are not being ripped off. Sometimes we might have a worse deal as a result, but the public will at least know that we have tried to get the best value for that money. That is crucial.

A lot of nonsense has been spoken about the leak of the confidential memorandum. It was assumed that we would always keep it quiet. The fact that a Department asks that a matter before the Public Accounts Committee be kept confidential may not mean that it will stay confidential. We investigate. We call witnesses before us, and they must give reasons why it should be confidential. If we think that the reasons are not right, we release it untouched. If we think that there is justification, we may decide to exclude certain parts of it. That is our duty or obligation. There may be serious reasons for the taxpayers' interests why certain matters should be confidential. The media condemnation was unjustified. We never reached that kind of decision—they never came before us to make that decision. It would be wrong to decide to release something before we even hear the case.

Very few matters that we take in private are not released in whole. Those that are kept back are usually to do with defence, the date of implementation of a new kind of weapon, cost and so on. There are just a few asterisks to meet that. In general, we are very open. The hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) will recall that all our sittings used to be in private. It is only recently that we have had the strong view that our sittings should be open, because we want to examine openly the matters that come before us.

I now refer to the 1989-90 Session, 13th report, "Ministry of Defence: Further Examination of the Sale of Royal Ordnance plc". In April 1987, the sale of Royal Ordnance plc to British Aerospace was concluded. Rather unusually, I should like to quote from the 48th report, Session 1987-88, because we had our preliminary investigation into the sale of Royal Ordnance plc then. That report deals with the price that was realised, £190 million, and the sale included land at Waltham Abbey and Enfield, which was sold to British Aerospace without any clawback provision for the taxpayer.

At paragraph 3(v), we said:

"We are concerned that, prior to deciding on the sale of RO, the MoD did not themselves explore the possibility of redevelopment at Waltham Abbey and Enfield or obtain an alternative valuation of these sites based on the assumption that their redevelopment might be approved in the future. We note that BAe could make a substantial gain on their sale or development".

That was before we knew anything about a valuation of Waltham Abbey or Enfield. It was without the advantage of hindsight. The Committee has the enormous advantage of hindsight. My colleagues and I try very hard to put ourselves in the place of the witness at the time the decision was made. However, this was something we did before, so there was no hindsight at all.

We said:

"We note that BAe could make a substantial gain on their sale or development without benefits accruing to the taxpayer beyond the sale price paid by BAe. We recommend that in any similar sales in the future, any feasible planning permissions likely to increase property values should be obtained before offers are invited."

That is of enormous importance. That aspect will arise again and again in respect of land. Values of up to £450 million were attributed to the sites. We found that values were substantially less than that, but there should have been a much bigger gain to the Government as a result of that sale.

I should like to give some examples of the questions that we asked. The late Ian Gow provided a splendid example which many of us well recall with both pleasure and sadness. However, I should like to quote from a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North. We were trying to establish what sort of valuation had been made of those two north London sites but were not getting very far, because we encountered all sorts of complications.

One of the most dramatic moments in the investigations carried out by the Public Accounts Committee came when my hon. friend declaimed in a rather more uncommon way than is usual. I should explain that each hon. Member now has only 15 minutes in which to make his or her contribution—nowadays, it is always "his" contribution. Our Committee meetings are so well attended and my colleagues' examinations are so thorough that we must all be limited in that way. It did not happen in the past, but it does now.

My hon. Friend was frustrated at not receiving a crucial answer about the method of valuation. Finally, he banged his hand on the table in a way that we can all remember and said—I shall not attempt to imitate his accent although one or two of my hon. Friends from Scotland might be able to do so—

"I only have 15 minutes, Sir Michael. I am going to ask you again. We have heard that potential use value . . . is different from use value . . . I am asking you, in the context of planning permission . . . whether you carried out a potential use value valuation on the land'

Sir Michael replied:

"We did not seek a valuation on conjectures about planning permission and the particular form that that use might take."

My recollection of that answer is slightly different. I thought that my hon. Friend got the answer, "No," but perhaps it was elaborated on subsequently. One's memory is always a little subject to uncertainty. The important thing was that, in difficult circumstances, we got an answer to that question.

Our report refers to the role of the Treasury. It is interesting to note that, in April 1988, a year after the sale to British Aerospace in April 1987, the Treasury issued new guidelines to Departments on procedures relating to the disposal of surplus land. Our report states:

"These guidelines state that with potential for development should normally be sold with the benefit of planning permission; but where this is inappropriate because of delays and uncertainties about the planning position, it may be appropriate to seek to secure from the purchaser any increase in value attributable to the grant of planning permission after disposal terms have been agreed."

That is exactly what we said before we knew about the failure to achieve for the taxpayer some of the moneys that we thought should accrue to him.

Paragraph 35 states:

"we consider that the Department might have been in a better position to evaluate the bids received if they had carried out a further revaluation as at about 1986;"

The value of land was changing rapidly at that time. The paragraph continues:

"invited bids for the Company both with and without a clawback provision; and if they had obtained an estimate of potential development values, particularly for Waltham Abbey and Enfield (even though this would have been conjectural) before deciding whether any special measures, such as clawback provisions, were necessary to protect the taxpayers' interest. In the Committee's view, consideration of a clawback provision for the Waltham Abbey and Enfield sites would have been prudent and need not have resulted in continuing Departmental involvement in the business decisions of the Company."

I am pleased that some account has been taken of our views on this matter. We look forward to seeing the guidelines implemented.

Paragraph 24 of the Treasury minute that deals with this matter states:

"The aim should be to secure, in a cost-effective manner, an assessment of both the existing use and, where relevant, the potential development values of property."

We welcome that reaction.

I refer now to "Financial Management in the National Health Service" and to the 16th report of Session 1989-90. We spend £12 billion on the national health service, which has 14 regional authorities and 190 district authorities. We have looked at the national health service fairly extensively in the past few years, in a manner that we did not previously. I know that several Committee colleagues welcome that, and play a useful and constructive part in our examinations.

I refer to one or two of our past examinations to show the range of our interests. In our 50th report of the 1987-88 Session, which considered operating theatres, we found that only 50 to 60 per cent. of our operating theatres are in use during the working week—I am not talking about evenings or weekends—and that was at a time when people were waiting up to two years for certain operations. With one or two exceptions, most of us are non-specialists, so that came as a bit of a surprise, especially in the light of the bottleneck in the operating theatres. We found out why it was happening and posed some useful questions to try to improve matters for the future.

I know from a recent press report that the Government have taken action on consultants to ensure that their services are properly employed. One problem with consultants is that their terms of appointment are set by the regional health authority, whereas their practice and their work is in the hospital.

Our 18th report dealt with hospital building. We discovered that it can take up to 15 years to build a hospital. A major problem with public sector construction is the enormous amount of time that it takes to get things done. I was in New York city this spring and had the impossible recollection that its hospital had been built in only one year. I thought that that must be wrong and that it was just a failure of memory. I therefore went to see how long it had actually taken to build it and discovered that it had taken only just over 50 weeks to construct from ground to finish in 1931. That is remarkable.

Of course, that is not a typical example, but it shows how far short our construction is falling if it can take 15 years for us to build a hospital, and there is then the delay in commissioning it and getting patients in. Something is seriously wrong.

Our 40th report of 1987-88 considered estate management. We found a number of crumbling buildings and a general failure to repair them, which in the end costs far more. However, more important than that was our discovery that central management in the national health service had tried to establish the condition of its estates by sending out a questionnaire to its 191 district health authorities. Only 113 replied; that means that one third did not even bother. What is the function of a management board if it does not even get answers to queries?

This is a most serious matter. It made us realise that something must be fundamentally wrong. If the central management of the national health service is failing to get the kind of replies to which one would think any such organisation should be entitled, the chief executive cannot discover that which he has a right to know.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): On the interesting point about the value of the national health service estate, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that asking about the value of a department's estate is what I might call the Public Accounts Committee's $64 question? When considering the evidence, it struck me as extraordinary that the national health service does not know the value of its own estate when, from all quarters, one hears about the pressure to build more hospitals. The right hon. Gentleman may remember that we discovered several buildings capable of renovation in areas where there was pressure for new building. Could he say something about that, because I found it a fascinating insight into what was going on?

Mr. Sheldon: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. It was a fascinating insight into the failure to know something about one's own business. If one is trying to be a chief executive of a body, one should know something about the business involved. There is no question but that we have brought about—I should say we are bringing about; it is too early to say that much has been accomplished yet—some improvement. We saw Mr. Duncan Nichol on those matters.

One report to which I refer frequently is that on premature retirement in the national health service. The Government decided as a matter of policy—it is open to them to do so and we do not question it—that the administration of the NHS was too top-heavy. Quite rightly, they said that it was necessary to bring about premature retirements and give redundancy pay to reduce the number of executives in the NHS. That failed to meet all our objectives.

Ever since then, in 1983, whenever someone comes forward with a plan, scheme or programme of any kind I like to know the objective at the beginning. I want people to quantify the objective as much as possible. Some objectives cannot be quantified too much, but I want it to be quantified as much as possible. I ask people when they are going to achieve the objective. At the end of the period of the plan, I want to compare the objective with the achievement. At the same time, there must be a monitoring system so that, if something disastrous is going on, it can be brought to a stop or changed. That is of crucial importance.

In the case of premature retirements in the NHS, it was not known how many people were likely to obtain or opt for retirement. We found that, in one regional authority, about 340—I am speaking from memory—opted for premature retirement. In another authority of comparable size, only one tenth of that number—25 or 30—opted for premature retirement. At the end of the exercise, it was not possible to say how much money had been saved. Nor could we be sure that some of the people who had taken early retirement had not been re-employed in the authority. We knew that some had been re-employed, but we did not know whether some had been re-employed by the same health authority. We strongly suspected that that was the case, but we could not prove it so we gave people the benefit of the doubt.

In such cases we must be sure that we have proper management and that we align budgets with need rather better. Our task is set out in paragraph 14 of the report:

"We attach great importance to timely and effective financial monitoring. We note the recent improvements made in financial reporting and expect the better flow of information to lead to tighter budgetary control throughout the NHS."

We welcome the Treasury minute on that. We know that obviously there is a shortage of suitable staff in the higher levels of the NHS, and we wish Duncan Nichol well in recruiting such people. We hope that there will be some improvements in the proper control of the whole of the NHS.

I now come to the 31st report of the Committee entitled "Quality Control of Road and Bridge Construction", Session 1989-90. We spend about £1 billion each year on motorways, trunk roads and bridges. Remedial work is carried out using concrete or bitumen. It is interesting that we still do not know whether concrete is a better substance than bitumen for road surfaces. I understand that certain other countries made that decision long ago. One would have thought that, with the help of the Transport and Road Research Laboratory and other bodies, we might have come to a firmer conclusion than we have reached so far.

There is a relationship between the cost of building a road and the cost of building including the premature repairs and traffic delays. In paragraphs 10 and 11 of our report, we point out one of the major problems:

"Quite apart from the misery, inconvenience and frustration caused to the travelling public by the need for largely unforeseen and unplanned remedial work, we are not satisfied that the Department have taken proper account of the true costs involved. Whilst premature maintenance costs need to be considered in the context of total construction costs, we believe that it is distorting the argument for the Department to suggest that the only alternative to their present course is to try to eliminate all risk of any remedial expenditure."

I do not argue with that. We say that when one builds a road one must take into account the cost of putting it right. I regret that I received the minute containing the Treasury's response only two days ago. We have examined these matters for a long time, yet it was brought to my attention only yesterday.

In yesterday's Daily Telegraph I noticed an adverse comment on the work of the Public Accounts Committee. I must say that I regretted that. We normally leave it to the Treasury Minister to respond and it is very rare that action is taken in advance of his response. The article shows that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary at the Department of Transport anticipated the Financial Secretary. It pointed out that "the vast majority of roads do not give rise to unexpected problems."

That is obvious. It is not our task to look at things that go right. Our task is to see whether we can improve things that go wrong. I am sorry that it was a Treasury minute; I could have understood if it had been a departmental notification. I have not had time to go into it as thoroughly as I would wish.

Paragraph 148 of the minute points out:

"traffic delay costs could be smaller when maintenance is premature since traffic flows will be lower . . . Costs and delays inevitably arise from maintenance,"

If one talks about a "premature" repair, one implies that the repair should have come later. If I have a repair done to my washing machine within six months, presumably it means that I will not need to have it repaired later on. However, the point is, "Was the washing machine right at the beginning?" The question is, "Was the road right at the beginning?" If it was not, how much extra would it have cost to get it right? I am sorry that we had that item.

Even though the Parliamentary Under-Secretary said several things about the Public Accounts Committee with which I do not agree, I was pleased to note that the Treasury minute goes a long way towards meeting our objections. I welcome that. In paragraph 146 it says that the Department will "introduce as soon as practicable an improved and computerised reporting system to cover all cases of defects and premature maintenance."

I welcome that. It is what we asked for and we have got it.

Paragraph 147 says:

"The principle of 'whole-life' costing is being introduced in setting highway design and construction standards—this takes account of both forecast maintenance and traffic delay costs."

I welcome that.

Paragraph 151 says:

"The introduction of a five year rolling programme . . . is assisting in these tasks. Assessment of the whole life cost of roads and bridges will also help to identify the cost implications of alternative timings for maintenance."

I welcome that.

Paragraph 155 says:

"Amendments to the Specifications for Highway Works are being introduced to secure improvements in the construction of concrete roads."

I welcome that.

Paragraph 162 says:

"The Department accepts the Committee's view that it must further seek to improve its effectiveness in managing this area of its business."

That refers to poor workmanship and sanctions to deal with it.

The minute also states that the Department of Transport

"has therefore appointed an independent consultant to carry out a wide-ranging review which will take into account the Committee's views and recommendations. The Department is also introducing new methods of selecting and appointing consultants who supervise its contracts."

We welcome that.

Perhaps the Under-Secretary is unaware of the role of the PAC. It displays a unanimity of view and it is trying hard to improve the quality of the administration of the Department. We are not sniping at it, but we are trying to seek definite improvements. I am pleased to note that the Treasury minute accepts that.

Some might argue that the improvements made were already in train and indeed a great many of our recommendations are accepted even before we put them. As soon as a Department knows that we are going to investigate, it carries out an investigation itself, which is extremely valuable. We do not try to score points about that; we could, but that is not our job. If someone takes action before we report on the matters that we are likely to report on, we welcome that. We seek to encourage that. I hope that that practice will always prevail.

We all suffer greatly because of problems on our roads. On Sunday, when I came down the M6, I encountered four major roadworks, none of which was less than five miles long. Obviously, I am very aware of the importance of repairs.

The task of the Committee is to deal with the various reports produced. We get a great deal of pleasure from the fact that we are able to deal with them competently and adequately. I could mention one or two other reports at some length—for example, that on the Crown prosecution service concerning decisions to continue prosecutions which vary throughout the country. There was also a report on hospital buildings and some of the associated problems, with which I have dealt in part only, as well as a report on the control and management of the Metropolitan police estate. That is an important report, which demonstrates that estate management should be introduced, as it should be in many other areas of our activities.

There were also reports on the National Seed Development Council and the failure to receive the proper sale proceeds.

It is important to mention the publicity services for Government Departments. I welcome the Treasury minute that dealt with that and I am pleased to note that the Treasury has accepted the view about dealing with such publicity to ensure that there should be clear objectivity by Departments when preparing it. That important issue was clarified and the message has gone out to all Departments, which we welcome.

Once again, I should like to thank my colleagues for bearing with me during the long evenings we spent together. I look forward to continuing our efforts on behalf of the taxpayer—that, after all, is our interest.

Sir Michael Shaw (Scarborough): As always on these occasions it gives me great pleasure to acknowledge, in common with the entire Committee, the tremendous work done by our Chairman, the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). Normally on these occasions we refer to one another as honourable friends to demonstrate the unanimity about which my right hon. Friend has rightly spoken.

At the outset, the right hon. Gentleman mentioned that Opposition Members are all too briefly with us as they move onwards and upwards. What happens to those former members of the Public Accounts Committee who must be feeling the push from underneath? Will they recirculate and come back to us before long? We all work as a good team as we pick up on each other's points and we form an effective questioning force under what has always been the very capable and tactful leadership of our Chairman, for which we thank him.

It would be remiss of me not to recall the sad loss of the former Member for Eastbourne, Mr. Ian Gow. He was a wonderful member of our Committee. He had an extremely shrewd brain and although it was not always immediately apparent, he was very kind. Some of the ways in which he put even the most casual question, however, made an accounting officer give it serious consideration. I imagine even the lightest question from him was regarded by such an accounting officer as one of threatening importance. Alas, we shall have him with us no longer.

It is important to remember that the Committee has helped to bring about a number of significant changes in Government accounting and organisation. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne has already mentiond internal auditing and non-executive directors and it is also important to remember the "next steps" agencies, the importance of value for money as well as targeting jobs and responsibilities within Departments. In all those areas the PAC, along with other Committees of the House—let us not forget them as well as the work undertaken by Government Departments and their attitude to our work, which has always been welcome—has made a significant contribution.

I first joined the PAC in about 1973. I did not stay long, but I came back in 1979 and I have been a member ever since. I have seen many changes in the way in which we conduct our proceedings. In the old days, the questioning was largely undertaken by the Chairman—we were lucky if we put a question in the entire two hours of the sitting. The reports of the Comptroller and Auditor General were fairly sparse and in no way comparable to the present ones that form the basis of our inquiries. Today the effect of the work of the Comptroller and Auditor General and of our reports within Government circles is much greater than it was. Certainly the Comptroller and Auditor General does more preparation than in the past. The same can be said of the Committee members before we go to our meetings.

[Sir Michael Shaw]

Although it is not for me to say, this might be the last time that I take part in these annual debates as I do not intend to stand at the next election. In that context, I hope that I am allowed to say that the standing and importance of the PAC has never been higher.

I echo the thanks that our Chairman gave to the Comptroller and Auditor General, Mr. John Bourne, and his staff. Without their help and comprehensive, thorough reports, our work would be impossible. I welcome the opportunity that we now have to go along to the National Audit Office to discuss matters of particular importance when they arise. While we retain our independence, our work results in great benefit for all.

I have said in earlier debates that the greatly improved Comptroller and Auditor General reports that we now receive, the greater thoroughness of our questioning and presentation of reports and the fact that our proceedings are normally open to the public give greater impact to our work generally and to our reports in particular. Publicity concerning the various issues arises when our reports are published. That is an advantage over the old system, when our meetings were held in secret.

The matters that we discuss are important and must receive attention immediately. So as we deliberate subject by subject, the media deal with each item, instead of having to deal with an assortment of subjects arising in one day's debate. By that means we can have wider influence than used to be the case.

Looking back over the year, I select for comment two items, one of which was dealt with by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, that of Northern Ireland. I have always had much sympathy for those with responsibility in that area. The conditions under which they operate cannot be regarded as in any way normal. The physical unrest and deep sectarian divisions create problems beyond my experience. But, as the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said, danger lies in the fact that we may cease to apply, in considering the reports of the Comptroller and Auditor-General for Northern Ireland, the same judgment as we apply to reports emanating from the Comptroller and Auditor General.

Whatever sympathy we may have, because of the problems of those working in Northern Ireland, we should do them a disservice if we failed to deal with the matters that they bring to us with the same critical eye as we give to other issues. We owe that duty not only to those who live and work there but to those who have invested, and others who hope to invest, large sums in Northern Ireland. Remember, the object is to try to make things work there as smoothly and normally as possible. That will happen only if we set the highest standards of inspection to the reports that come before us.

Regrettably, some extremely sad reports come to us. Occasionally one tends to say, "Never mind, it is Northern Ireland." That is the wrong attitude to take. We must examine the issues and say, "Let us try to get things right." From the reports that have come to us from the Comptroller and Auditor-General and the witnesses who appear before us, it is clear that all concerned are trying to improve matters. I believe that it will not be long before we see improvements. That will be justification for the seriousness with which we tackle the issues.

One is bound to feel sad when considering the report on, say, roads and the system of stocktaking the stores scattered throughout Northern Ireland. It was clear that the system of stocktaking was inadequate. Happily, the notes that we are receiving, particularly following the cross-questioning of witnesses that I conducted, show that the stores are under much better control. The system generally has been much revised, with the internal auditor now seeing that reports go direct to the top man rather than to an intermediary. Because of more effective stock control, less stock is required. That is always a good sign. If stocks can be reduced, that is a sign that the business is being run more efficiently.

As I say, many of the reports are depressing. Particularly depressing was the report about the plant nursery, and I shall comment on only a few points about which I asked questions. Obviously, no system should be allowed to continue if nobody is taking stock and stocks are increasing year by year. That way lies disaster. Indeed, had the organisation been in private hands, disaster would have occurred more quickly. One must express worry when Mr. Murray, the auditor, said that it had never entered their heads that people were not taking stock. He described that as "a fundamental error." The mind boggles at the thought that an auditor did not check to see whether somebody was taking stock. We find such fundamental problems arising time and again.

I hope that I am not being optimistic when I say that, as a result of our inquiries, things are beginning to improve. Indeed, we must proceed on that hope, just as I hope that officials are proceeding on the conviction that we shall continue to make inquiries into their activities.

My second point about Northern Ireland concerns the land registry. Although a serious lapse has been evident, we can learn from it in other areas. The land registry was set up and the same fees charged for a long time. A witness said:

> "Fees were not revised in the intervening years because it was mistakenly believed that the registry was operating at a surplus, when in fact it was not covering its costs."

Why was it not covering its costs? The answer to that question was terrifyingly frank. We were told, in effect, that there had just been a mistake, and they were all sorry about it. It is terrifying to think that those who filled in the accounts did not realise that they should have been adding sums for headquarters costs. That state of affairs continued for a long time.

I cross-questioned witnesses on that issue because, although it was a basic error, it covered a significantly wider sphere. If an agency is established—the land registry, although not an agency, was a type of agency —one must consider the fees and departmental expenses. That is where the wider sphere comes in. In this case, those making up the accounts were correct, except that they did not add a big sum for departmental expenses, remembering that those involved at headquarters were anxious, for obvious reasons, to spread their expenses over as many branches as possible. The differences were enormous. When we cross-questioned the witnesses about the expenses of headquarters that could be relied on as being part of the land registry, Mr. Murray said:

> "In normal circumstances I would not spend much time overlooking the land registry".

His assistant, Mr. Mackenzie, said that he spent perhaps 5 per cent. of his time on the land registry. Look at it as we would, we could not see that the enormous difference in the cost of overheads that had been missed out was justified by any facts concerning the services rendered by head office. I hope that that is now being examined more cautiously; there is a formula, but I doubt that it is accurate.

The other report that I wish to mention is "The Next Steps Initiative". This is a first-class initiative, and I am greatly encouraged by the fact that it is being brought in carefully—at times slowly, perhaps, but that is better than rushing into it without getting it right; big costs may be involved if we do not get it right.

The Public Accounts Committee said in paragraph 3(v) of its conclusions:

"We note that, consistent with the Government's priorities for Next Steps, the agencies established so far were set more demanding financial and operational targets accompanied by additional flexibilities on financial matters and staff and pay to enhance their ability to operate more efficiently . . . We agree with the conclusion of the C & AG that, if continued, this early demonstrated commitment on the part of the parent and central departments to the thrust of the initiative augurs well for the success of Next Steps".

I entirely agree.

The example of the cross-questioning in the Northern Ireland report makes me wonder whether we are being careful enough to ensure that, in certain cases, we are not simply creating another department to be looked after by the Department itself. I put that question to the representative of the Office of the Minister for the Civil Service—what a mouthful that is—and asked him,

"to deal with the problem of what has been described as the people back in the departments syndrome. The responsibility still lies with the Minister for the agencies so far as Parliament is concerned.

(Mr. Kemp) Yes, correct.

So he will want his civil servants to brief him on statements, on questions and anything relating to an agency.

(Mr. Kemp) That is right.

That means to say therefore that the Department back home will tend to formulate a staff that will double bank the agency so that they can get the information from the agency and use it and check and put forward to the Minister.

(Mr. Kemp) I hope very much not."

I hope not too. It has been admitted that there is an interface, but if it is not carefully guarded, that interface can grow and there can be additional expenses.

Talking of expenses, departments such as town halls have a lot of fixed expenses to meet. I have noticed that the more that they can feed them out to their various departments and agencies, the more they are prone to do so. That is why they do not like getting rid of them and turning them into private enterprise efforts: then they have fewer places in which to put their overheads. I trust that nothing of that sort would be allowed to happen in Departments of state.

I thank the Chairman of the Committee for all the work that he does, and for the enormous effort that he puts in. Above all, I thank my colleagues on the Committee for the way in which they try genuinely to examine the problems, rather than seeking to turn the process into a political fight. That is the essence of the Public Accounts Committee; long may it continue.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): As a new boy on the Committee, I shall make an extremely brief contribution, although I should add in my defence—in case I wander into a slightly longer speech than some might wish—that mine is a renewed rather than a new membership. I was a member of the Committee as far back as 1966, when—as was pointed out by the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw)—things were somewhat different.

What is still enjoyable, however, as the hon. Member for Scarborough pointed out, is the "consensus" way—if I may use the "in" term—in which the Committee members approach the task of analysis. It is significant that this is the first time since I became a member that we have sat in "confrontational" postures to discuss our work.

As a new Committee member, I already have my collection of yellow cards from our Chairman, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). However, let me say while I have his good will —for I see him smiling—that on one of his foreign tours he must have bought a Brussels watch: I think that it is operating on metricated minutes, which, as everyone knows, are far shorter than the imperial minutes on the watches of the other members of the Committee.

It is a matter of deep regret to all of us that our late friend and colleague Ian Gow is not able to take part in our discussions today. We all miss his charm, wit and friendliness, as well as the pungent relevance of what he had to say.

I am a living embodiment of the contention that all is onward and upward amongst Opposition members of the Committee. As an ex-industry Minister, I should have liked to take part in the discussions on Rover; but, as I was not a member of the Committee at that stage, it would have been rather presumptuous of me. I shall therefore save my comments until—as I hope—we examine the matter again.

I shall confine myself to two issues. My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred to the criticism that he felt was due to the University Grants Committee for allowing University college, Cardiff to get into the predicament in which it now finds itself. The fact that the Committee has had to focus on that has to some extent made life more difficult for the new administration, which is having to cope with difficulties that it did not create. Its operations are clouded by the £4·4 million of repayable grant that had to be taken to ease the college out of difficulties that should never have existed in the first place.

It is to the credit of the new administration that, in the last year, it made a surplus of £4·8 million before provision to its capital account, and anticipates a surplus of £4·5 million this year. There has been a remarkable turnaround since we had our chance to discuss the fortunes of the college. Indeed, I am delighted to hear from the principal that about 25 per cent. of the £4·4 million has already been repaid, and that within six months the debt will be less than £3 million.

As well as dealing with the administrative consequences of the tragic circumstances in which it found itself, the college is making a massive inroad into the financial problems that it was forced to inherit. It is doing so against the background of rapid expansion. It is spending—not over-optimistically—£20 million on expansion, new building and the introduction of local area network facilities for the newly emerged University of Wales Institute of Science and Technology and Cardiff university college and it shows all the signs of completely shaking off the clouds that it inherited from the previous administration.

[Mr. Alan Williams]

One interesting point, which was raised when I had discussions with the principal, was that when the Universities Funding Council makes its projections—colleagues at the National Audit Office may like to consider this and discuss it with the UFC—such discretion is used that comparisons between universities may be invalid or difficult to sustain. The principal said that that applied to the way in which inflation and staff costs are treated for future projections. University authorities may use their discretion about the precise formula that they use. The principal said that Cardiff used the UFC's most pessimistic scenario for its projections. He demonstrated the scale of such differences by saying that a 1 per cent. difference when assessing the situation means a £1·5 million difference in staff costs over five years, and a £3 million difference in overall costs in the same period.

If further analysis and reports to the Committee are to be undertaken, I hope that the UFC will consider whether it can make projections more consistent.

As a Welshman I wish to mention a matter which is of some local inconvenience to the people of Wales, and to those who choose to visit us or to come to Wales on business trips—the problems of the Severn bridge, which are mentioned in the report on roads and bridges. It will be no surprise to hon. Members to hear a Welshman say that we regard it as a sad saga.

The Friday before last people had to queue for more than three hours to cross the bridge in a westerly direction. It is not merely a question of inconvenience and cost. It upsets lorry schedules and it affects commercial drivers, who have limits placed on the hours that they are allowed to drive. However, there are wider implications than boring inconvenience. What is most galling is that the situation is unnecessary, and that came out in the report. I shall mention later the Treasury minute based on the report, but the National Audit Office report states clearly that in 1961, at the last minute, just as construction work on the foundations of the bridge was about to start, the Department of Transport introduced a new design. It was novel, and it presented new technological problems.

The NAO also said that, having introduced the new design, the Department proceeded to ignore its guidelines, procedures and standards. The Department did not carry out the calculations that would usually have been expected for a bridge design. Sadly, eight years later the bridge was showing signs of corrosion and fatigue.

I am sure that the Chairman of the Committee shares our bewilderment that, far from that being a source of hand-wringing in government, section 148 of the Treasury minute, to which I referred, states that, because corrosion was discovered early in the life of the bridge, it should have been a matter of great rejoicing. According to the Treasury, as there was less traffic crossing the bridge when the corrosion was first discovered, it was less of a problem than it would have been if it had been discovered later. The problem is that we have had to put up with it for the intervening 20 years, so I do not find the Treasury's argument very persuasive, and £17 million has had to be spent on the bridge.

The permanent secretary told us that much of the work done on the bridge was to strengthen it against wind damage, damage from collision with a ship and to accommodate two and a half times the planned vehicle load.

As the National Audit Office report points out, 52·5 per cent. of that £17 million was used for remedial work and only a quarter was used for anything to do with strengthening or increasing the capacity of the bridge. Three quarters of the work that has had to be carried out on the bridge was remedial, and was due to what is described in the report as "design faults". So we are back where we started in 1961, when the Department of Transport at the last minute ignored standards, practices and procedures. The resultant design faults are still blighting the lives of motorists virtually 30 years on.

A fascinating coincidence—not lost on the users of the bridge—is that when the toll was increased recently, according to the report, the increase was needed to raise £50 million to carry out the balance of the work needed on the bridge. Tolls were increased to raise less money than had been demanded to carry out the remedial work. In other words, if the bridge had not needed remedial work, the tolls would not have had to be increased. The bridge needed remedial work because of design faults and it had those faults because the Department did not do its job. I find those circumstances hard to reconcile with the statement made in the House by a transport Minister who said:

> "The work is designed to upgrade the bridge for the future; it is not in any sense a reflection upon the quality of the original design of the bridge, which was built fully in accordance with the standards that then applied."—[Official Report, 27 November 1989; Vol. 162, c. 543.]

One wonders who was briefing the poor man. I am sure that he would not have made that up, and I am sure that he would not readily have come to the House with a statement so contrary to the facts. No Minister wants to give the House information that he knows is blatantly incorrect.

As is revealed in the National Audit Office report, the people of Wales now face cost and inconvenience because a Ministry failed to do its job and to carry out its responsibilities in the way that everyone in Whitehall thought it was carrying them out.

The Treasury is hedging its bets in its response. Paragraph 158 states:

> "The Department found no evidence that standard checking procedures were not fully complied with"— which is rather different from saying that they were, which is what one might have hoped that the Treasury would say.

> "It is difficult to be precise about events which happened over thirty years ago" that is even more dubious, it raises even more question marks—

> "but it was not necessarily practicable nor appropriate fully to apply standard procedures to an innovative design."

The NAO, therefore, has it all ways. There is no evidence that the Department did not carry out its normal procedures, though the Committee and the National Audit Office criticised it for not doing so. However, the Department virtually implies that the Treasury would have criticised it had it carried out the normal procedures because, it says, the normal procedures were not necessarily appropriate to the new design. Which posture is the Department adopting? Is it saying that it did carry out the normal procedures or that it did not and that the Treasury is glad that it failed to carry them out? We are left in the dark. All we know is that the motorist is still paying for errors that need not and should not have arisen—errors which were the direct result of departmental incompetence, as demonstrated by the NAO report.

The House will understand the feeling of many people in Wales that they should not have to carry the cost of that incompetence and that it ought to be borne by the Department that imposed those errors upon them.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): I, too, pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), the Chairman of our Committee. I have been a Committee member for 11 years. During that time there have been two Chairmen, both of them Opposition Members who have brought a penetrating mind to that job. If this is to be the last public accounts debate for my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw)—though I personally doubt it—I should like to say to him that his acumen, too, has been of an extremely high order.

Two qualified accountants sit on the Public Accounts Committee. However intuitive and good the rest of us may be, it is important that colleagues with up-to-date experience of the latest accounting practices should sit on the Committee. My hon. Friend is not the youngest member of the Committee, so it is a great tribute to him when I say that he is very much up to date with what is happening and that it shows in his questioning of witnesses.

I ask the House to reflect on the Public Accounts Committee's role in the years ahead. Its role may change, as may the nature of this debate. The PAC is the watchdog of the legislature and the Administration. The Committee carries out its investigations after the event; it does not challenge the policies of the Government of the day. It accepts policy objectives and examines what has happened. That is a strong starting point. As the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said, the Committee is greatly supported by the Comptroller and Auditor General and the staff of the National Audit Office. About 1,000 people, most of them highly qualified, are beavering away. In their green reports they produce material that, on the whole, is of a high standard. I hope that they will not mind me saying "on the whole". There have been instances when the reports have veered into policy areas and when they have gone too far towards producing policy proposals. As a person who has a modest area of woodland, I have to declare an interest when I say that when I look back at the forestry report and see the present level of planting it is obvious to me that it has been unduly influenced by some of the activities in north-east Scotland.

I am concerned about the nature of what I call the green reports—the National Audit Office reports—in the sense that they are, quite incorrectly, seen by the media as the work of the Public Accounts Committee. That is unfortunate. It is not clear to the public that the Public Accounts Committee still has to look at those reports and decide whether it agrees with them. We shall have to overcome that difficulty.

My Committee colleagues know that I have strong feelings about the presentation of our reports. The format of our reports has changed a great deal while I have been a member of the Committee. When we visited the United States about eight years ago I was impressed by the fact that there the conclusions are brought to the front of reports. A little persistence has resulted in the Committee's conclusions now being printed at the front of its reports.

Moreover, it seemed to me to be illogical that one had to be a ferret of considerable ability to find the Treasury's response to the Committee's conclusions. I refer to the Treasury minutes. I am delighted that the Committee's recommendations are now listed in the Treasury minutes and that the answers are given there. I thank the Treasury Bench for having achieved that change.

The Committee can still learn from what happens overseas. When they look at the front of any of the Committee's reports, the public can be forgiven for wondering what they are all about. I refer, for example, to the Committee's first report on financial problems at universities. I believe that there would be merit in the Committee doing what our cousins across the water do; it should highlight the three key points on the front cover.

There is no doubt that our work is successful with the civil service, but I do not know whether it is entirely successful with the Government of the day or the House. Part of the problem, I believe, is that we still conduct too many inquiries. There is little merit in a plethora of inquiries; the Committee would do better to conduct in depth fewer inquiries.

Ever since I became a member of the Public Accounts Committee I have taken a great interest in the national health service. I can almost reel off the number of NHS reports that the Committee has published. If, however, I did not have the most marvellous filing system in the East Cloisters, I should be unable to delve into the Committee's inquiries six, seven or eight years ago. One of the challenges for the Committee is to collate that great bank of knowledge and recommendations, some of which will become highly relevant as changes occur. At the moment the Committee depends entirely on the accounting officer's memory. The usual answer is that he was not in post at the time, so he cannot help. We are unable, therefore, to rely on the Department. Moreover, the memory of those in the National Audit Office is not quite as long as the memory of Committee members. The challenge that we must face up to in the months and years ahead is to effect a link between the present and what happened six, seven or eight years ago.

The same point could be made about privatisation. The Committee has considered privatisation and the disposal of Government assets in many of its reports. We must pool together all the lessons that we have learnt from those reports.

I believe, too, that the scope of the Committee's considerations needs to be reappraised. My hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough referred to Government agency agreements. There is little doubt that the Committee will have to consider closely the relationship between a Government agency, the Department and the expenditure of public money. My hon. Friend mentioned overheads. The whole structure will have to be looked at closely.

As we come to the end of the era of privatisation—there is not much left to privatise—there will be public sector bodies which are not agencies or normal Departments but which still have public money in them. When we passed the National Audit Act 1983, nationalised industries were kept outside, mainly due to the chairmen of those industries. The time will come in the near future when we should reassess our scope in that area.

[Mr. Michael Morris]

We need to look at Europe. It may be just circumstantial good luck, but on the Order Paper today from the Leader of the House is the new structure for analysing the work of the EEC and the directives that come to us. In the new Session we shall have three Select Committees looking at draft directives split across three broad subject areas. It does not need me to re-emphasise to the House the importance of the EEC and its relationship with this Parliament. I plead considerable ignorance of our relationship with the European Court of Auditors and how the linkage will work in relation to the ever-increasing importance of Brussels. In our new Session we should have a deliberative discussion on the linkage with our work in Europe.

I want to deal with two of the reports, which both cover the same area: the first report on the financial problems at universities and the 16th report on financial management in the national health service. The report on the universities is principally about Cardiff but that has been covered adequately. I want to emphasise the recommendation that we made about universities generally. In paragraph (f) we make it clear that we remain concerned at the serious financial difficulties facing many universities. We emphasise the fact that the Universities Funding Council should monitor what is happening and we recognise the importance of the restructuring exercise that is in hand. The report says:

"On both these matters we expect the Council to keep Parliament fully informed on progress and results."

That is a crucial paragraph and should not be forgotten.

The 16th report on the NHS is also about financial control. It picks up the aims of resource management initiatives. It explains the importance of case histories and regrets the slippage that occurred during 1988-89 and 1990-91. The response in the Treasury minute says that action is being taken.

If I have a worry that I wish to share with my colleagues, it is that in both higher education and the NHS —outside defence they are the two large areas of public expenditure—the aim seems to be to achieve a financial "level plain". In my judgment, that is the wrong way round. The philosophy of the Public Accounts Committee over the years has been to ask people what their objectives are. Their objectives are concerned not with finance but with policy. Currently, those policy objectives appear to be subsumed by the financial objectives. We run into great difficulties as a Government and a nation if we allow the accountancy element to dictate policy rather than the other way round.

The Chamber is fairly sparsely attended, but I should tell my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee that it is time that we had a deliberative session on the scope of the Committee, its relationship with Europe and the financial dimensions involved.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): I should like to join other Committee members and say that I regret the tragic loss of Ian Gow from the Committee and the House. As several hon. Members have said, we shall all miss his incisive and perceptive style of questioning. The Committee benefited from his example, especially those of us who are younger and less experienced. I was a particular beneficiary because I sat next to Ian Gow and benefited from his whispered comments, many of which would not bear repetition in the House. He was always ready to say what he thought about a witness in terms that were as incisive and perceptive as his questioning.

I should like to join other Committee members in expressing my appreciation for the work of the National Audit Office. As years have gone by we have all learnt increasingly to appreciate its work. It is not patronising to say that the quality and standard of its reports and the work behind them has improved tremendously over the years. Every year we find that they are better and better and more informative. They go far beyond the old style of reports, which were concerned only with ensuring that civil servants did not abuse the taxpayer by taking his money. That is, of course, an important part of the work of the National Audit Office and it must ensure that there is no question of fraud. However, its work has gone beyond that now. We are concerned about value for money, as is the National Audit Office.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said that many of our recommendations are put into effect before we make them. The same can be said to a greater extent of the work of the National Audit Office. Many of the faults, defects and errors of Government Departments are corrected before the NAO reports on them. That is to be welcomed because we do not want a lapse of time. We want them to be corrected as quickly as possible. However, the NAO does not always receive the credit that it deserves. Having talked to members of staff, I know that they recognise and accept that. They do not resent it because they are inspired by the spirit of dedication to public service. They are happy to see that things are put right. Nevertheless, this is an occasion on which to point out that the full benefit of their work cannot always be appreciated because we do not always know how many stable doors have been shut before they have been opened.

I should like to join other Committee members in expressing our appreciation for the work of my right hon. Friend the Chairman. We all recognise his skill and the leadership that he provides. I would not say that both sides of the Committee appreciate his work because, as he said, we do not work in that way. We all appreciate his skill in choosing who shall ask a question next. In an unguarded moment he once confessed to me that he sees himself much as an American football coach, playing Committee members as appropriate and bringing them in when he thinks that a witness deserves them. I am sure that he will particularly miss Ian Gow's contribution in that respect. As the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) said, we all appreciated his contribution. He was much too self-effacing in his remarks. Also, we shall miss the hon. Member for Scarborough if he is to leave the House at the next election.

The hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) made some interesting suggestions about the way in which we can improve our work and the presentation of our reports. It is a great misfortune that we confine ourselves to one debate a year. In that debate we are expected to consider many reports. This year we are expected to consider 40 reports, but it is sometimes more. That is too much to digest and too much to debate. I am not suggesting that we should have a debate for every report, but some reports would merit their own debate. For example, the report on the quality control of road and bridge construction would have merited a debate. A case can be made for having a series of debates in which we might take several reports together. This year, we have had several reports on the national health service, and it would have been useful to have a debate on those reports as a group, in which we could have drawn out common suggestions, themes and criticisms of NHS management.

The hon. Member for Northampton, South drew a comparison between the problems of the national health service and those of universities. That has been one of the themes of this year. The health service and universities are suffering from a similar problem, and too often we assume that it is overspending. I wish that we could spend more time asking whether they are underfunded rather than overspending, because that can produce the same result of expenditure exceeding income. Perhaps we should consider whether they are receiving enough money, not simply whether it is being overspent.

I link that with the objective of value for money. Too often, we fall into the trap of assuming, as sometimes do the National Audit Office reports, that value for money means spending less. Sometimes, we get better value for money by spending more. I give as an illustration a question that I put to the chief executive of the national health service management executive, and I was disappointed that he did not seem to understand the difference. If the national health service spends 2 per cent. more and treats 5 per cent. more patients, is not that better than spending 2 per cent. less and treating 5 per cent. fewer patients? It is a real cost improvement if more money is spent and more patients are treated because it comes from higher productivity and the unit cost is less. In our questioning and reports, we do not place the right emphasis on getting real value for money, which may result from increasing the amount spent by a Department or service.

I was delighted that my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) assured us that University college, Cardiff is doing much better and resolving its financial difficulties. However, that university is an example of it being better to take two reports together. Our first report, entitled "Financial Problems at Universities", was occasioned by the difficulties at University college, Cardiff, in which I took a personal interest. We have a Treasury minute, which is why it is included tonight, but we do not yet have the Treasury minute on the 36th report, entitled "Restructuring and Finances of Universities". Those reports would have made a good debate, because the report on University college, Cardiff and its problems leads naturally to the more general and wider problems of other universities.

Although many of the witnesses who appeared before us in the past year were rightly criticised, the Universities Funding Council was the least impressive of the bodies that we examined. I draw the attention of the House to some of the comments that we made in our first report, which arose from the difficulties at Cardiff. In the report, which was published on 15 January, we said:

"We believe strongly, however, that the UGC"— as it was then called—

"should have taken earlier and more positive action to identify, appraise and tackle the financial difficulties at Cardiff. They were well aware of the difficulties facing universities as a result of grant levels; and indeed they assured our predecessors that they would be discussing with universities exactly the sort of staffing problems that lay at the heart of Cardiff's troubles. We consider that they took too passive a role in concluding that they were unable to challenge the College's view that no staff reductions were necessary."

We expressed our respect of the independence of universities and said that

"this does not mean that the UGC should have abjured sufficient control to be able to assure themselves of competent financial performance by universities."

We added:

"We also consider that the UGC made an error of judgment in not reporting these problems to Parliament in their annual survey at the first available opportunity."

We then commented on universities generally and said:

"We remain very concerned over serious financial difficulties facing many universities. We expect the new Universities Funding Council to monitor developments closely and to intervene as necessary to ensure a high standard of financial management . . . We expect the Council quickly to build up the planning arrangements, financial management and information systems, and the capacity for monitoring and analysis which are essential for the effective allocation and oversight of the grants to universities. We look to the Council to secure prompt and determined action where required by the public interest, whilst recognising also the responsibility and autonomy of the universities themselves in such matters."

We ordered that report to be published on 15 January 1990. The evidence on which it was based had been taken on 11 May 1988, and I revert to the point made by the hon. Member for Northampton, South that sometimes we should try to issue these reports more quickly. When we received the Treasury minutes in April 1990, the Treasury told us that

"The monitoring of all universities' financial position has been improved by: UFC requiring institutions to produce annual financial forecasts, which are then analysed; institutions presenting their accounts in a uniform format according to newly-agreed conventions so that they can readily be analysed and compared with previous forecasts; financial relations between UFC and the institutions being governed by financial memoranda which set out conditions under which Exchequer grant may be paid; and the UFC establishing an internal audit unit and generally strengthening its financial expertise."

Unfortunately for the Treasury, we had taken evidence between our report on the problems at Cardiff and their general application and the publication of its minute. We had taken evidence in February, only six weeks after we had prepared our report on Cardiff's problem. The Treasury minute published in April bears little relation to the evidence that we were given in February, only two months before, by the chairman of the Universities Funding Council, as is shown in our report, which came out quite recently.

In the report, we say:

"The Funding Council needs to act vigorously in discharging its new responsibilities and ensuring a high level of accountability to Parliament for the financial control exercised over university expenditure and the economic, efficient and effective use of resources."

We make other comments, conclusions and recommendations, culminating in the statement:

"The Funding Council must take vigorous, prompt and effective measures to resolve these matters."

The echoes of the first report are in our 36th report. Between May 1988 and February very little had improved or changed; indeed, I find it difficult to see any improvement or change. I do not believe that the Universities Funding Council has done anything like enough, and it did not have to wait for our report. If it had followed the suggestion and encouragement of my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne to put the greater part of recommendations into effect before they were made, we should have expected some progress to be made between May 1988 and February 1990, but I regret that we did not see such progress.

Therefore, it would be a good idea if, from time to time, we took reports together, as the hon. Member for Northampton, South suggested, to consider recommendations made a few years before and what happened when we took evidence at a later date. That would improve not only the work of the Committee but, much more important, the performance of Departments and accounting officers. Perhaps sometimes it is a good idea to go back to see what was recommended by our predecessors perhaps five or 10 years previously and how much has been done, rather than simply considering rather bland and flattering Treasury minutes that promise much but produce very little.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis), who makes a signal contribution to our discussions in the Public Accounts Committee. As he said, he sat next to our friend, Ian Gow. The highest tribute that I can pay the hon. Gentleman is that he and Ian made a fine team in putting witnesses on the spot, in the interests of taxpayers. They worked well together in our Committee. Ian might well have been speaking at this moment almost where I am standing.

Many hon. Members, particularly the Committee's Chairman, the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), referred to Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland report. One sentence in the 36th report sums up the way in which Ian Gow went straight to the kernel of the problem. On 14 June 1989, he asked the accounting officer, Mr. Blease:

"Does it come as a surprise to you if members of this Committee have read with disbelief the report of the Comptroller and Auditor General?"

Mr. Blease replied, "No." Ian put his finger on the deplorable failure of administration which had taken place in that case, and in many other cases—a failure described by the accounting officer as "appalling". I echo the comment of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne—who was properly given support by the Ulster Unionist party as he said it—that we do not expect third-world standards of administration from parts of the United Kingdom. I used that expression in questioning as well. As the right hon. Gentleman said, we expect and demand as a Committee exactly the same standards of administration in any part of the United Kingdom and we trust the Comptroller and Auditor-General for Northern Ireland to bring these cases before us, as Dr. Jack does now and as his distinguished predecessor, Mr. Calvert, did before him. All of us remember debating the disgraceful events involving the De Lorean report, to which the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred. It was one of the most serious failures of administration and of spending control ever to come before the Committee in the more than 100 years of its existence. The Committee rightly drew attention to that failure in its lengthy report, which the House felt necessary to discuss in a separate debate.

I have listened carefully to this debate, as I have listened to many over the seven years in which I have been a member of the Committee. There is always a danger, which we have not wholly avoided today, of being like soldiers pinning medals on to our own chests. There is always a danger that we shall say, "We are all doing very well. Everyone is very happy. If people were not happy, the House would be packed and Members would be moaning about the Committee's failure. The fact that people are not doing that suggests that the Committee is doing its job well." I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) and other hon. Members have made it clear that, while we have important work to do, we must never be complacent about it. We must always look for ways of improving and refining it in conjunction with the National Audit Office, which does such a signal service on behalf of taxpayers, and under the guidance of our Chairman.

Other than my direct constituency work of bringing the problems of my constituents before the House—which we all have to do, as it is an essential part of our duties—I believe that the work that I do on the Public Accounts Committee is far and away the most important thing I do in the House. It is the only thing that makes any difference. About 80 per cent. of what I do in the House is probably wasted, and perhaps 50 per cent. is harmful. The work that I do on the Committee is beneficial to taxpayers generally, for only one reason: because of the structure of public service, the method by which the National Audit Act 1983 was drawn up and the Committee's work, the Committee can bring the accounting officer, the permanent secretary, the Sir Humphrey Appleby, before it, and he has to come personally.

One report which no one has discussed and which is probably not widely known is described as the second special report. It was published a few months ago and in it we set out the revised terms of appointment of accounting officers. Publishing the report provides a useful service to the public, who can see what accounting officers and permanent secretaries have to do. I should like to quote from paragraph 11, because it is an important point about which the public should know. The report states:

"If a course of action is in contemplation which raises an issue not of formal propriety or regularity but more widely of prudent and economical administration, it is the duty of the Accounting Officer to draw the relevant factors to the attention of his Minister and to advise him in whatever way he deems appropriate. He may think it right to refer to the possibility of criticism by the PAC. If his advice is overruled, he should ensure that both his advice and the overruling of it are apparent clearly from the papers."

I have talked to Ministers many times about that matter and several have said that that is no idle threat. On several occasions, they have made suggestions to the accounting officer, to the permanent secretary, who has said, "No, Minister. We cannot do that because I am the poor Charlie who has to go before the Public Accounts Committee and explain it away, not you. We must not do that." I asked Sir Peter Gregson when he appeared before us during the Rover inquiry whether the process of giving a written minute to the Minister had taken place. He said that it had not happened. I have asked that question on other occasions, for example, during the De Lorean affair. This is a strong power for members of the Committee. It enables an accounting officer to persuade politicians, of whatever Government, that they cannot take actions that would look bad in front of the Public Accounts Committee.

Perhaps the Committee's principal strength is not the unanimity to which the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred or the back-up of the Comptroller and Auditor General, which is essential; it is the fact that the Committee is properly resourced. The House has devoted a lot of time—I remember the 1979 debates—to considering whether we should strengthen the Select Committee procedures. The debates took place when Lord St. John of Fawley was setting up these Committees as Leader of the House. Distinguished Members, such as Mr. Enoch Powell, took the view that such Committees were potentially detrimental to the House because they would take people away from the Chamber and allow for a consensus approach that would take away from the flow of party conflict. There are distinguished Members of the House now who still take that view and periodically express it.

There has been such a danger in the reports and the proceedings of some departmental Select Committees. To some extent, it depends on the subject that they have taken. If they take highly partisan subjects, they are likely to produce highly partisan reports or reports with a 7:6 majority. They often do so on the basis of the views of the expert witnesses and advisers who have been hired for the inquiry. By passing the National Audit Act and making the Comptroller and Auditor General's Department responsible to the House, the House has said, "Here is a properly resourced, fully staffed and efficient Department that does all the work in advance." On several occasions, led by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, the Committee has not been prepared to continue an inquiry because a Department has come to us disagreeing with the words in a green report. The Committee cannot operate on that basis. We have to have an agreed report in front of us. Then we can proceed.

As the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne and other members of the Committee remember, we have sent some of those great mandarins away with their tails between their legs because we have not been prepared to put up with them arguing about the text of the Comptroller and Auditor General's report when it should have been agreed in advance. On one occasion—no names, no pack drill—a permanent secretary took me out to lunch to get my advice on how to appear before a Public Accounts Committee. I gave him my advice, he thanked me very much for it, and shortly afterwards he retired from Government service.

Our work will become increasingly important. We often have to deal with the work of, for example, the Ministry of Defence, where billions of pounds have been wasted by inefficient procurement, poor management and so on. The Committee has greatly welcomed the appointment of Sir Peter Levene and much of his work as Chief of Defence Procurement.

As I sit in the Committee Room, under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, two afternoons a week, most weeks of the year for the past seven years, it makes me mad to have to look again at examples of deplorably sloppy administration and of money being wasted, whether it is just a few hundred thousand pounds in Northern Ireland, such as happened in the nursery—which is none the less important—or billions of pounds in the Ministry of Defence. It is being wasted at a time when I, like all other hon. Members, have to go to surgeries in my constituency where I meet constituents who are not receiving pensions or social security and who are getting into difficulties over housing, over the community charge or in other areas. There is no money to deal with that because much of it is being wasted in faulty administration.

This may be my last speech in this debate. I believe that this is the role with which Members of Parliament especially have to deal. We have to go to the Committee and we have to read learned tomes from the National Audit Office. Finally, we have to say to ourselves that we are elected to represent ordinary people and it is their money that is being misspent. We must say, "I do not care, Sir Humphrey Appleby, whether you were there when it happened or not. You are the person who must explain to us why it went wrong and, above all, what you are going to do to get it right." That is why my hon. Friend the Paymaster General is sitting on the Treasury Bench now. That is why, when my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary winds up the debate, he and the Paymaster General will be taking governmental responsibility in their replies. I hope that when they go back to their Department they will say to their officials—who work very hard—and to all those in other Departments, "Look, at the end of the day, I have got to take the flak on the Government Front Bench. Please go away and smarten up your administration."

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I congratulate the members of the Public Accounts Committee on their work. I am a new Member of this House. On making my first acquaintance with PAC reports and on reading through them, I have been greatly impressed. I have also been impressed by the way in which the Committee members have carried out one of the primary functions of the House—scrutinising the work of the Executive. Having read the high quality of the reports that they produce, it is slightly disappointing to come to this debate and to see acres of green on the Benches.

I intend to concentrate on the matters relating to Northern Ireland that are highlighted in the reports. However, before I come to those, I have a passing comment relating to the first report in 1989-90 on "Financial Problems at Universities". That has already been touched on by several hon. Members and there has been particular reference to University college, Cardiff. It has been said that it was remarkable that the University Grants Committee, as it then was, seemed to be either ignorant or reluctant to act when matters at Cardiff were getting out of control.

Belfast is a lot further away from Cardiff than London is. However, as a former university teacher, I must tell the House that the fact that Cardiff was running out of control was common knowledge in the common rooms of Belfast long before the UGC or the Government acted. I find it rather sad that matters turned out as they did. The Government bailed out University college, Cardiff on condition that many of the senior staff who were responsible for administration had to have their careers prematurely ended. I notice that the same penalties were not publicly applied to those in the UGC who had been turning a blind eye to the situation for several years.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) referred to the comment made by the permanent secretary of the Department of the Environment in Northern Ireland on the cases mentioned in the 36th report, which related to the nursery. The permanent secretary said, "They are appalling cases." The chief executive of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive said:

"there had been a degree of negligence at every level involved in the management and control of the nursery . . . " and that it

"did not receive adequate attention at the highest level."

He was asked:

"what was the highest level at which you regard responsibility? . . . Where did the buck stop?"

The chief executive replied:

"The buck stops with . . . "

The text peters out in three dots. He continued:

"If something similar were to happen now, the buck would stop with me".

The comment about "appalling" cases was made in reply to a question from the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. He said:

"These are two very bad cases. We hope we will not have to be dealing with this sort of thing again."

Eight months later, they were.

The 26th report of 1989-90 deals with the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's essential-car user scheme. Under the scheme, essential-car users were entitled to a high allowance per mile and to low-interest car loans. The executive was promiscuous in the number of people it designated as essential-car users. At first, there were 1,084, but after a while the executive realised that too many had been designated and the number was reduced to about 500. The 584 or so disappointed former essential-car users threatened legal action, which was settled by the executive at a cost of £1·2 million in compensation. The executive had handled the matter in such a sloppy way that it had to pay out that sum. That was far more than was lost through the nursery scheme, which was described in the 36th report.

The case of the Housing Executive is especially galling to hon. Members who sometimes have to press the executive about the housing needs in their constituencies, only to be told that insufficient funds are available for this or that development. It is galling to see the millions of pounds that the executive has managed to lose. Money has been lost in other places as well. Other hon. Members have referred to the claims made by people who have allegedly tripped while walking along the footpath. It would be wrong to give the impression that the fault lies with the courts in Northern Ireland. It lies with the executive and with the Department of the Environment for failing to defend cases that were plainly spurious. Once word got round that all one had to do was to make a claim and that, like "Monopoly," one could pass "go" and collect more than £200, everybody was on to it in some areas.

We see such cases occurring again and again. As well as commenting on the individual cases, we should say that there is a need for a more radical approach to the way in which the administration of the executive is conducted. The Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee commented on the De Lorean case and referred to the rather curious position of the two directors appointed by the Government to serve on the board of De Lorean. As hon. Members are aware, the Northern Ireland Housing Executive is not a normal housing authority. Unlike all the other housing authorities in the United Kingdom, it is not under the control of a local authority or of elected representatives. There are three elected representatives on the board, but the majority of the members are not elected, but appointed. The main criteria for selecting the persons to be appointed are that they will ignore the views of the elected representatives and will acquiesce in the views of the management of the executive. If one appoints to a board people whose chief qualifications are that they will do nothing and that they will acquiesce in what the administration does, it is not surprising that such situations develop.

Those familiar with the Upper Bann constituency will understand why I could not help feeling that there is a remarkable contrast between local councillors and Ministers, civil servants and chief executives, such as those of the Housing Executive, when it comes to the sort of negligence that leads to the losses with which we are dealing. If a local councillor were to act in a negligent manner he would be surcharged, but if a Minister ignores a situation—the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) told us that the nursery was the subject of his first parliamentary question when he came to the House, so Ministers were not ignorant of the situation—there is no surcharge, despite there being clear negligence. It is remarkable that people who serve without remuneration in local authorities can be exposed to considerable financial penalties, whereas persons who serve in the House and elsewhere, for a respectable financial reward and with considerable opportunities for earning on the side, should be responsible for the same or even worse losses without any penalty falling on them.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton referred to the penalty of having one's conduct adversely commented on by the Public Accounts Committee. That clearly is a penalty of sorts, but it is quite different from the penalty on councillors. Something should change in that respect.

I am sorry to refer to the hon. Gentleman again, but he said, and I entirely agree, that the Committee expects the same standards of administration in Northern Ireland as elsewhere. One way of achieving that is to ensure that Government Departments and other bodies in Northern Ireland are subject to the same disciplines as Departments elsewhere. The same standards will not be achieved without the same disciplines. Part of the problem in Northern Ireland is that bodies there are not subject to the same disciplines as bodies elsewhere. With the honourable exception of the Public Accounts Committee, the conduct of those Departments is largely ignored. Despite our continual efforts to persuade the Government to establish a Select Committee, as proposed by the Procedure Committee, nothing has been done. I hope that that road block will be removed so that we see the same disciplines applied in Northern Ireland as here.

The same report deals with cleaning and portering services in hospitals, which are the responsibility of the Department of Health and Social Services in Northern Ireland. My concern here is that the Department's response to the Public Accounts Committee's conclusions is weak in a couple of cases. The Committee refers to guidelines for the operation of the cleaning services and concludes that the DHSS should ensure that guidelines on good practice on any health-related subject are implemented. Unfortunately, the response is weak. The Department merely note the Committee's comments and says that where appropriate it will set up mechanisms to monitor the implementation of such guidelines. Such a weak response makes one unsure about whether such guidelines will be implemented.

The Committee's third conclusion on cleaning services in hospitals was that low unit costs, which in some areas are remarkably low, should be examined to ensure that a proper quality of service is being maintained. The Department's response to that conclusion was to remain virtually silent. It just says that the variations in high and low unit costs had been investigated and then goes on to refer, as if as a solution to the problem, to the present competitive tendering initiative imposing a discipline. I wish that it were possible to be confident that competitive tendering would cure the danger of a low quality of service, but, if anything, I fear that competitive tendering is likely to result in lower services than we have at the moment.

Looking through the minutes of evidence, I was struck by a comment made by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton. He said that in England opposition to competitive tendering had been minimised because most tenders in NHS hospitals in England had been won by in-house organisations employing the same people who had done the work before. If only the same were the case in Northern Ireland. Far too often in Northern Ireland, the in-house tenders have been overridden in favour of outside tenders which gives real reason to believe that a lower quality of service will be delivered.

The Department's response to the Public Accounts Committee's conclusion on competitive tendering was that substantial savings were expected, but there is considerable doubt about whether there will be substantial savings and we fear that any savings that there may be will be swallowed up in other losses. For example, the Southern health and social services board in my constituency, which is responsible for cleaning and portering services in hospitals and which claims that it is achieving some savings through competitive tendering for cleaning and similar services, is moving to new headquarters. It decided not to move to new headquarters in Craigavon but instead to go to Armagh at a higher cost—some £2 million. I hope that the relevant Minister will take heed of that and act accordingly.

I conclude as I began, by congratulating the Committee on the thoroughness of its work, and I hope that more time will in future be devoted to its work.

7.56 pm

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): I add my tribute to the late Ian Gow, a dear colleague whom we shall all miss for many years to come. My abiding memory of him on the Public Accounts Committee was asking the question that he used to ask the accounting officer at the very beginning of his contribution, "On what day did you take up your appointment?" By getting the answer to that question, he was able to fix firmly in the minds of members of the Committee the date from which that accounting officer had responsibility for his Department. His questions were always penetrating, and his contribution to the Committee's work is a great tribute to his memory.

Listening to the debate, it is evident to me that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) was right when he said that the Committee's role is changing. This is one of the more interesting debates that we have had because we have talked about the way in which the Committee works and that is of interest not just to us as Members of Parliament but to the British public and the British taxpayer.

It is all the more important that my hon. Friend should have made that point, because the British taxpayer can now watch the Committee at work and see what he or she is getting by way of value for money in return for the taxes that are paid. That must be one of the most important advances that has been made by Parliament since the Committee was set up in the last century.

One of the most interesting sessions that the public had the chance to watch on television was the Committee's examination of Sir Peter Gregson, the permanent secretary to the Department of Trade and Industry, when he was giving evidence on the sale of the Rover Group to British Aerospace. That episode rivalled anything in "Yes Minister". Sir Humphrey Appleby is in serious danger of being replaced or retired. Sir Peter gave a masterly performance in a remarkable session.

We have not yet published our final report on Rover Group, but we have published an interim report and a report on the leak of evidence which was published by The Guardian. This evening I am in the somewhat curious position of being able to comment on the sixth report of the Public Accounts Committee on the sale of Rover, but I do not have the advantage of having at my disposal the Treasury minute which sets out the Government's views. That will have to wait until the final report appears in due course.

Several of my colleagues have already referred to the effect of the Committee's work on the civil service. I am an occasional lecturer to the civil service college, and I have been impressed by the extent to which civil servants, as part of their training, are helped to understand the work of our Committee. That is valuable in maintaining the high standards in the British civil service.

I have just returned from Zimbabwe, where I had the privilege of being a member of the delegation to the 36th Commonwealth parliamentary conference. Together with several other members of the Public Accounts Committee who were also members of that delegation, I attended a fascinating session on the work of Public Accounts Committees in other Commonwealth Parliaments which proved to be one of our most interesting sessions. My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) and I were fascinated to learn that, in Zimbabwe, the Committee has the power to have police present at hearings, to fine accounting officers who have not done their job properly and to have them arrested by the police afterwards. That has not proved necessary in Britain yet, and I hope that it will never be. However, it is interesting to note that some of our Commonwealth colleagues find it necessary to adopt more draconian measures than ours.

The most fascinating investigation which the Committee has carried out in recent times has been into the sale of Rover Group to British Aerospace. The motor industry and motor cars have provided us with some of our most interesting work over the past few years. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton for the quite extraordinarily effective work that he carried out when we investigated the affairs of the De Lorean motor company.

In our sixth report on the sale of Rover Group, we considered the fact that, in 1975, the British Leyland Motor Corporation was making heavy losses, was facing bankruptcy and was taken into public ownership. In August 1988, the Government sold their 99·8 per cent. shareholding in the company to British Aerospace for £150 million, after providing a cash injection of £547 million in recognition of the company's debt and to support its investment programme.

From 1975 to the sale, the taxpayer had provided £2·9 billion in non-interest-bearing capital to support the company. My memory of my 18 years in this House is punctuated by periodic attendances in the Chamber to listen to debates in which Industry Ministers of both Labour and Conservative Governments sought to persuade hon. Members that they should vote yet another large tranche of our hard-pressed taxpayers' money to support British Leyland. A staggering sum of money was invested in that company—unfortunately to very little effect. We could all see the considerable difficulties which the company experienced until the time when the Government were obliged in August 1988 to take it into public ownership to prevent it from going bust.

When we came to the point of examining the sale of the company to British Aerospace for £150 million, it was perhaps not surprising that the Committee was anxious to be clear beyond all shadow of doubt that the Government's actions were justifiable and that the taxpayer was getting value for money for the sale of that very considerable asset. That was the basis of our investigation.

As I have said, the Committee has not yet published its final report, but the interim report is before us this evening and I can therefore pick out one or two of the salient points which will doubtless feature in the final report.

Last December, we examined the Department of Trade and Industry and its financial advisers on the sale and we had before us as witnesses the permanent secretary to the Department and his colleagues and a representative from Baring Brothers—otherwise known as Barings. We questioned them on the arrangements for the sale and the adequacy of the financial terms that were eventually agreed.

As the basis of our examination, we used a report and separate memorandum from the Comptroller and Auditor General which concluded that Rover Group was worth substantially more than the price that was agreed with British Aerospace. The purpose of the interim report is to deal only with the facts relating to the exclusivity and conduct of the Department's negotiations with British Aerospace and the handling of the relations with Parliament and the European Commission. As I have said, the conclusions will be set out in another report. The exclusive nature of the deal which the Department of Trade and Industry did with British Aerospace is the subject of this interim report.

British Aerospace first expressed interest to the Department in buying Rover Group in February 1988. We were told that its interest was conditional on the granting of exclusive negotiating rights, and the chairman of Rover Group told the Department that, in his view, such exclusivity would be in the company's interest. He was obviously very concerned that open competition would cause a repeat of the uncertainty that had damaged the business in 1986, during the negotiations with General Motors and Ford which, the House will recall, were abortive.

As a result of the chairman's view and the events that took place in 1986, the Department considered that competition would put the Government in a better negotiating position and might lead to better sales terms. However, it accepted that competitive bidding would lead to uncertainty and might so damage the company's prospects that the Government would have to consider extensive contingent liabilities under what are called the "Varley-Marshall-Joseph" assurances which are named after former Industry Ministers. The assurances would not allow Rover Group to be left in a position where it could not meet its obligations. They were worth £1·6 billion as the contingent liability. We must take that huge sum of money into account when trying to fathom out what determined the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to agree to the exclusive deal and sell Rover Group to British Aerospace.

The Department received legal advice that the exclusive negotiating rights granted to British Aerospace should amount to no more than a statement of intent to deal exclusively. The negotiating rights would leave the Department free to take account of any other offers that it might receive from potential bidders. In fact, we were told that approaches were made by four other interested parties —Ford of Europe, Volkswagen, Lonrho and Melton Medes, which is a Nottinghamshire company.

The Committee asked the Department why it believed that the threat that competition posed more than outweighed the benefits of a limited competitive tender of the kind of which it and Barings had originally been in favour. In evidence, the Department told us that the Government had carefully considered whether to proceed on that basis. They recognised the advantage of competition in giving a benchmark against which to measure prices, but they concluded that a public auction would be damaging to the company.

That belief, which was shared by the company, was based on the experience of 1986, when interest by Ford and the consequent loss of confidence by dealers and customers resulted in a decline in the Rover Group's market share from 18·4 per cent. in January to 15·8 per cent. in February 1986. That market share was never recovered.

As I recall the evidence and the climate in the Public Accounts Committee, that information certainly had a substantial bearing on exclusivity—that the creation of uncertainty in relation to a motor company can result in a substantial and rapid loss of market share which it is extremely difficult ever to recover. The chairman of Barings made it clear to us that that decision was a matter of judgment by the Department. It is not a matter of certainty; it is a matter of judgment.

We found ourselves considering a very interesting matter indeed. We noted carefully that an initial deal for the Rover group was concluded with British Aerospace in one month. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) talked about the time that it takes to build a hospital—15 years—but the speed with which the Rover Group was sold to British Aerospace was quite breathtaking—one month.

We therefore asked the Department why it was in such a hurry to sell the company, given that it was simply the Government's wish to dispose of it within the lifetime of this Parliament. We were told that the Government took the view that, if they could end the uncertainty about the future of the Rover Group which had persisted for a considerable time, it would clearly benefit the company. Of course, they were anxious to relieve themselves at the earliest opportunity of the contingent liabilities under the Varley-Marshall-Joseph assurances, which were very substantial indeed.

The taxpayers who watched the Public Accounts Committee taking evidence at the meeting on 4 December must have been aware for the first time that those large contingent liabilities still existed and that they might have had to put their hands into their pockets once again. That did not happen, because the company was sold.

We also pressed the Department of Trade and Industry on why it did not opt for a public flotation to test the market. That had been done before. We were told that, after extensive analysis, it had concluded that it was not a viable prospect and that trying to sell the shares on the open market was not really a serious runner.

We looked closely at the money involved. It has been talked about a great deal in the press and on radio and television. It was not just the £150 million that British Aerospace paid for the company that interested us: it was also the assets which the company acquired in return for the £150 million and what happened to them. At the end of the day, all that added up to a net cost of £460 million to the British taxpayer, because it included a debt write-off of £469 million, further assistance in the form of regional assistance, the easing of tax restrictions and the payment of British Aerospace's costs. It also included withdrawal by British Aerospace from the Columbus project.

We had to consider whether the spending of £460 million of British taxpayers' money could be justified in the very speedy disposal of that company to British Aerospace. We had it in mind that, because the Department did not have the benefit of competition to determine a fair price, it had nothing to act as a benchmark or a valuation of the assets in negotiations with British Aerospace. The Committee was told that the aim was to assess a fair price for the company on a going concern basis, taking account of past losses, including interest of £2·7 billion, injections of public funds of £2·9 billion, and potential liabilities under the Varley-Marshall-Joseph assurances of substantially more than the £1·6 billion that I have just mentioned.

The company had achieved a profit—not a very big one—of £27·9 million before tax and interest, which it hoped to improve in subsequent years, but only at the expense of a £1·5 billion capital expenditure and restructuring programme. In looking at the episode, one must take into account those two huge figures, the £1·6 billion contingent liability and the £1·5 billion capital expenditure and restructuring programme. They are very large sums of money indeed.

Clearly, any company considering the acquisition of the Rover Group from the Government would have had to think carefully about whether the modest profits of the company would justify taking what must be considered a fairly substantial commercial risk, bearing in mind the uncertainty of the motor industry, the fact that far more cars are being produced than there are customers to buy them, and the fact that, all over Europe, Governments are supporting and propping up motor companies by subsidies of one kind or another, whereas if there were no subsidies in the free market there would undoubtedly have been a considerable rationalisation of motor manufacturing capacity some time ago.

We had to look at all those figures and try to balance them. I cannot say more than that. I cannot pre-empt any decisions that the Committee may come to in its wisdom, on which it will report to the House in due course. However, I can refer to the sale of the company's assets, which were quite substantial. I think that they amounted to about £106 million. That matter must be considered, together with the purchase price of the company.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred to the absence of a clawback provision, something with which we are all familiar. When an asset which belongs to the taxpayer is disposed of and it is subsequently proved that it has been disposed of at a price lower than it should have been, there is often provision for clawback. We asked why, in the case of the sale of the Rover Group, no provision had been made in the sale and purchase agreement for clawback within a prescribed period.

In reply to our questioning, the Department of Trade and Industry told us that the Government had imposed a repayment clause in relation to the main core of the Rover Group's business and on the tax losses on the company's trading, but they had not extended those arrangements to the disposal of surplus sites and the disposal of stakes in the associated companies. I should not be at all surprised if the Public Accounts Committee had more to say about that when it eventually makes its final report on this matter.

It was therefore with considerable concern that the Committee, in studying the final memorandum from the Comptroller and Auditor General, noted that the £150 million price of the Rover Group did not have to be paid until 30 March 1990. We are all familiar with the offers that are made nowadays by just about every motor company—one does not have to pay any interest for a year. We are not so familiar with such a situation when it comes to disposing of public assets, yet it appears that that is virtually what happened—the company did not have to pay until the end of March. I can only guess that there must have been some considerable arm twisting to persuade British Aerospace to buy it and for the Government to have accepted that condition.

The Committee asked why that fact had not been publicly announced. We were told that those matters were referred to in the proper place in relation to parliamentary scrutiny and control of the estimates and expenditure under various legislation. Vigilant though Members of Parliament are, it has been known that perhaps not all of them scrutinise the estimates as carefully as they should; they may therefore miss, deep within them, a fact such as that which we felt was so material to our consideration of the Rover Group. If such a sale is ever again contemplated, the date on which payment is due should be made known to the House. Hon. Members should not be left to discover it by accident from a close scrutiny of the estimates with a large magnifying glass.

The House will have to await the final chapters of this interesting episode. I believe that the Committee did a powerful job in flushing out much of the information that the public had a right to know. On this occasion, it did so with the television cameras switched on. I have subsequently met many people who are not as well informed about what we do here in Parliament as hon. Members, but who said that they found it the most fascinating investigation by a parliamentary Committee.

That greatly encouraged me. It convinced me that television has been a welcome innovation into the proceedings of the House and the Standing Committees. I hope that we shall see far more of the work of our Select

[Mr. Michael Shersby]

Committees and our Standing Committees on television in future, because many people who cannot easily come to London to sit in the Strangers' Gallery can take a great deal of interest in what is going on. That is of considerable benefit to us, because they often send us information that we can use when questioning witnesses.

In conclusion, I pay tribute to our Chairman for the most skilful way in which he conducts our proceedings. I hope that this will not be the last such debate in which we shall hear a speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw), who is a wonderful colleague, and a skilful member of the Committee. I hope that we shall have another such debate before the end of this Parliament. I make the same remarks about my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham), who said in passing that this might be his last such debate because he is not seeking re-election to Parliament. I shall never forget his powerful contribution in our six-month inquiry into the De Lorean affair. It was a substantial contribution to parliamentary scrutiny of the Executive.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): Unlike most hon. Members who have spoken in the debate, I have never been a member of the Public Accounts Committee, but I believe that its work is vital to good government and to the well-being of our constituents. This collection of reports has an impact on some of the poorest of our constituents, such as those on housing benefit, pensioners and those living in rented housing. The Committee's reports should be taken seriously by all hon. Members. I agree with the comments made by the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) on the presentation of the reports and their number. He said that many of the reports are lost to time, buried in filing cabinets, and that they are not linked to later reports. As a result, the recommendations are not connected and are not taken as seriously as they should be.

I shall concentrate on four of the reports—the retail prices index report, which is the 34th report of the 1989-90 Session; the report on housing benefit, which is the third report of the 1989-90 Session; the report on housing association grant and housing needs allocation which is the 27th report; and the 16th report, which deals with financial management in the national health service.

I recall that a recent Government press release used the retail prices index almost as a unique selling point because the Government were anxious to claim that, because increases in social security and pensions which are to be announced in the forthcoming uprating statement, will be set at current inflation rates—at the rate this October—the poorest pensioners and those in receipt of social security benefits will receive a bumper bonus in April. However, that relies on the crucial assumption that inflation will be reduced by then. Furthermore, the briefing failed to mention that in the previous five years the rate of inflation when the benefits were fixed in October was lower than the actual rate of inflation when the benefit payments started the following April. In other words, for five years those on pensions and benefits have, in effect, been shortchanged.

If that is seen as a strong statement of the case, I refer hon. Members to the report on the retail prices index. In paragraphs 30, 31 and 32 the Committee draws attention to a computer error that led to an understatement of the retail prices index in 1986 and again in 1987. As the report states, that led to

"many millions of people receiving lower pensions and benefits than they were entitled to receive."

Paragraph 32 states:

"The Government considered that the Exchequer should not benefit from the error and special compensation payments, totalling some £102 million, were made to recipients of specified pension and social security benefits. In addition, donations totalling £14 million were made to appropriate charities to reflect small underpayments to a large number of beneficiaries rather than incur disproportionate administration costs in meeting individual payments. Nevertheless, the estimated administrative cost of the compensation exercise was some £5 million."

In other words, the cost of correcting the error and of giving the money to charities was £5 million. Although the report states that it involved we are talking about weekly amounts being deducted from people's pensions and benefits, which could have had significant effects. It meant that the poorest in our society were paying the price for that computer error.

"small entitlements to a large number",

The language of inflation is changing. We do not just have inflation now; we have "headline inflation" and the "underlying rate" of inflation. It is almost as if there is a deliberate attempt to split the concept of inflation. We have already heard proposals to take mortgages out of the retail prices index. The Public Accounts Committee report refers to that—I am glad that it recognised the difficulties of doing so. There have also been proposals to remove all housing costs from the RPI. When that proposal is advanced, it might be worth reflecting on the fact that there is a rampant rents explosion. Rents are increasing far too quickly and beyond the rate of inflation, yet we now hear that housing costs may be deducted when calculating the rate of inflation.

There have recently been proposals to ignore oil price rises when calculating inflation. It seems logical to some —perhaps to those who believe that inflation could be brought down to zero—that if everything in life that increases in price were excluded from the calculation, inflation could be reduced. The easy way of bringing down inflation is by deflating the way in which it is assessed. Of course, we need a realistic measure of the price changes in goods and services. That is basic to any assessment, whether of housing benefit payments or hospital budgets. It is essential that people know where they stand, so that budgets can be assessed in the first place. But one does not arrive at that realistic measure by manipulating inflation down because its actual rise is so deeply embarrassing to a Government who are committed to abolishing it entirely.

We are awaiting the Treasury response to that report from the Public Accounts Committee. We should look forward to it but when the new means of defining the retail prices index is brought before us we should not forget that many millions of people depend on that assessment for their pay and their pensions. It is absolutely crucial to get it right.

There is a clear link between the report on the retail prices index and the third report of the Committee on housing benefit. In the Treasury minute in response to the housing benefit report, it is more than clear that there has been enormous difficulty with housing benefits because of a mismatch between Government policies in the Department of the Environment, which deals with the whole structure of housing and rent costs, and the practice in the Department of Social Security. I quote the conclusion of the Public Accounts Committee, which appears in the Treasury minutes:

"We find it unfortunate that an important measure . . . of controlling Housing Benefit expenditure—the power to ask the Rent Officer to determine a fair rent for tenancies entered into before April 1989—was withdrawn. We recognise, however, that policy in this area is mainly the responsibility of the Department of the Environment."

The Treasury minute did not go on to add the conclusion of the sentence which said:

"and trust that they were aware of the considerations which were of importance to the Department of Social Security."

I remind the House that in March 1988 there were two Bills before the House on which I had the fortune or misfortune to serve in Standing Committee practically simultaneously. One was the Local Government and Housing Bill which dealt with the deregulation of rents. The other was the Social Security Bill, which dealt with fixing the formula for housing benefit repayments to local authorities. In another Treasury minute we read:

"DSS and the Department of the Environment maintain close liaison on issues such as this where their policies interact. The Government decided to repeal the power of local authorities to apply for registration of a fair rent for a regulated tenancy".

The difficulty was that the boxed thinking of the Departments meant that one Standing Committee did not know the policy measures being dealt with by the other and which were incorporated in the Bill, which later became an Act. It was pointed out at the time that simply to deregulate rents would result in housing benefits being paid on astronomically high rents. That was not regarded as a problem in the Department of the Environment Bill but the DSS had not realised the impact of deregulating rents on its budget.

When one Department does not know what the other is doing, it is crucial that such matters are ironed out for one simple reason. If there is a difference between the level of the rent and the amount of housing benefit paid to those who are means tested in order to receive assistance to pay their rent, it is crucial to know who pays the difference. Is it the tenant, who is means tested and may be on full housing benefit? If such tenants find that they get rent increases they cannot pay they may receive notice to quit and are evicted. Or must the local authority pay the difference? In that case, other local authority tenants make up the difference because the amount falls on the local authority housing budget. I am glad that at last the issue of the abolition of fair rents has been picked up and that it has been acknowledged that a space has been opened up for exploitation of housing benefit by unscrupulous landlords. The report referred to "abuse by landlords who require tenants to pay unreasonably high rents on which benefit is then paid."

The key question of who pays the difference—the tenant or the local authority—must be answered because those entitled to full housing benefit as a result of means testing of their already low incomes should be the last people to pick up the difference.

In the report on housing association grants and housing needs and allocations we read a clear policy statement:

"Social housing is intended for those who cannot afford market prices or rents".

Again, there is a clear conflict of policy. The Government encourage market rents, which in turn undermine social housing. In practice social housing is being priced out. Even housing association housing is driven to cut costs and increase rents. Although the Treasury response cannot and has not taken account of the recent instruction from the Housing Corporation to housing associations that they must compete for housing association grants, the impact of that action will be an increase in rents.

The assessment of housing needs is the assessment that local authorities make of their local housing resources. They must assess what their area needs. The assessment is submitted to national Government. Local authorities are then given, not a grant, but permission to borrow, in order to get on with the job of providing and maintaining the housing stock in their area. The assessment is based on the general needs index. I draw attention to the report, which stresses that the index is not sufficiently locally sensitive to changing needs and improvements and developments in housing. To give a practical example, if an authority in an inner city area such as Leeds has many houses with outside toilets it is given a weighting, because the houses need to be provided with inside toilets. But if the authority improves all those houses it will be penalised in the allocation. In practice, it is better to keep the houses with outside toilets because that increases the local authority's weighting.

I am glad that the issue of the general needs index has been raised, but the key is in paragraph 14 of the report. It shows beyond a doubt that the crucial issue is that of resources. It says:

"Because resources had been too limited and the process of 'damping' operated since 1986 had limited changes in the Index scores, the Department had only used the Index in an attenuated form since 1986."

Paragraph 15 says:

"We regard it as unsatisfactory that the distribution of housing resources to local authorities has been based for so long on out-dated assessment of needs."

That focus is most welcome. Again, the emphasis must be on the general lack of resources. I accept that, as the Chairman of the Committee made clear, the reports are written in restrained language. However, there has been a deliberate reduction in local authority housing budgets of two thirds in the past 10 years. My own authority needs and has asked for £112 million for this year's programme. It will be interesting to see what response we receive in the weeks and months ahead. In the meantime, I hope that when we consider housing needs we take account of the absolute shortage of housing and the needs of people for a decent, appropriate and affordable home.

Lastly, I wish to glance at the report on the health service. In the general statement in the Treasury minute paragraph 59 says:

"The Department of Health considers it most important that health authorities should be in a sound financial position when the White Paper changes are introduced and has made elimination of deficits a priority for 1990-91 through flexible and realistic planning."

It seems that the entire response of the Treasury to the Public Accounts Committee report is based on the future projections for the White Paper. We are entitled to ask what that statement means. The Public Accounts Committee could be drastically overworked in the next few years examining health service reports precisely because of the changes in the White Paper. The issue at root is balancing the books for the deadline of next April when hospitals put forward their bids to be self-governing trusts and to opt out.

The PAC recognises the difficulties of planning using estimated pay and price inflation, which is calculated a long time in advance. The current policy that has been implemented augurs no real change in practice from the proposals in the report. For example, Leeds general infirmary—the LGI—has put in for self-governing status and it must balance its books by April. It has, however, overspent its budget for the first five months of this year and across the entire district health authority the deficit has now reached £500,000. That deficit has largely arisen from funding for Leeds general infirmary.

Unit general managers have been instructed to freeze staff appointments and to cut spending on drugs and equipment, and catering and portering services are to be reduced at Chapel Allerton and Newton Green hospitals. The director of finance has instructed that vacancies in hospital administration are not to be filled and that payments of bills are to be delayed where possible. That is precisely the opposite of the recommendation in the PAC report and the response to it by the Department of Health recorded in the Treasury minute. That minute makes it clear that where possible the payment of bills is not to be delayed. It is clear from the current budget plans and their implementation that ward closures and cuts in essential services represent the only option for Leeds general infirmary if it is to get its budget deficit under control or anywhere near balanced by next April.

The PAC report devoted a great deal of attention to condemning "crisis management". Paragraph 66 of the Treasury minute records that the Department of Health

"shares the Committee's condemnation for the crisis management measures used in the NHS; such measures are never acceptable."

Crisis management is happening now, but what of the future? The inflation estimates in the documents provided for the opting out of Leeds general infirmary and St. James's are miles from reality and the inflation figures for two areas of the same city have been estimated at between 5, 3·5 and 3 per cent. for the LGI and 7, 5·5 and 5 per cent. for St. James's for the years 1990-93. There is a real discrepancy and that is especially important when one considers that if the estimated inflation figure is not met the expected impact of the actual inflation will be provided for by "a reduction in service levels".

Recently the Leeds Western health authority has had to pay out about £1 million in compensation. I understand that only one third of a million may be met out of the local budget, but even that will mean a reduction in local services.

The Leeds health authority budget could be balanced if land and property were sold—the houses that Leeds general infirmary owns—but site sales to balance the books cannot be the way out of crisis management in the short term. That is not an appropriate programme for an expansion of services.

I hope that, before the trust proposals are put forward, the Department of Health will seriously consider the PAC report and the Treasury minute on it. I hope that those reports will be sent to the regional health authority so that it can consider them before submitting its details. If that does not happen, the same mistakes that arose over housing benefit and the computer error and housing rents will be repeated. Despite advance warnings, we shall find that, surprise, surprise, in future years the accounts of the self-governing hospital trusts and declining health service provision will provide the bulk of the work for the PAC. I hope that the Treasury will advise the Department of Health to look carefully again at the authority's proposals before they are proceeded with.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): First, I should like to endorse all the references that have been made by the Chairman of the Committee and other Committee members to our late colleague Ian Gow. Nothing that I can say can add to what has already been said, but we have a duty to ensure that his memory never fades so that the murderous creatures who brought about his death realise that they will never be able to achieve their aims with the bomb but only through the ballot box.

I am always surprised that this debate is not better attended and not subject to greater demand by hon. Members because the material source is rich and varied, as the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) has just illustrated. There is no danger of galloping over the same old ground for the sixth or seventh time. One should never call the speeches of hon. Members boring, but a debate on a narrower subject tends to be somewhat repetitive when the same fact is examined in a variety of different ways. Perhaps we could learn something from the Bundestag, where debates that take us six or seven hours are limited to just three hours.

I cannot compete with the long service medals that have been paraded this evening. In comparison with 20 years or so of service, my three years on the Committee makes me a relative new boy. I was, however, taken by the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris), who spoke of the need to examine our procedures to see how they could link with the European Court of Auditors. The work of the PAC is subject to continual review and perhaps we should examine whether there should be a closer link with European methods of examining how various Government Departments work.

In the three years that I have served on the Committee I have seen various Departments and topics come round and round—I hesitate to say, like bad pennies. One issue, however, that does not come round time and again is the retail prices index, to which the hon. Member for Leeds, West has already drawn attention. I believe that it is some 10 years since it was subject to the scrutiny of the PAC. Apart from some criticism of the methods by which some information is collated—something that can be easily put right—the PAC noted:

"The assurance of the Central Statistical Office that the basic framework of the RPI ensures an extremely robust indicator for measuring consumer price inflation."

It goes on to say, however, that it welcomes

"the consideration currently being given to the development of a statistical reliability model" for the index and the efforts to develop

"a systematic methodology for assessing possible enhancements".

That addresses the question whether the basket of goods representative of family spending four years ago is still accurate. It also leads one to question whether there is any regional balance or shopping types that should be taken into consideration. Perhaps the RPI should be targeted relative to the group to which it is applied. The obvious example is the pensioner whose weekly basket of purchases may not be identical to that of the average family. I do not wish to say anything further, but if we use an RPI on which decisions are made, it is appropriate that it relates to the group subject to those decisions rather than being a general index that may not be accurate.

The 29th report of the PAC concerns the Customs and Excise and specifically the disposal of drug smugglers' assets. I believe that that subject illustrates that constant dripping wears away the stone, as I first raised the disposal of drug smugglers' assets through Customs and Excise in the 22nd report of 1989-90. The response then was to the effect that the Treasury was not yet persuaded of the merits of the scheme, mainly because it did not think that it would be right that the resources devoted to drug smuggling and we were told that the discussions were continuing.

The matter having been re-examined this year, I am glad to note that it has moved on somewhat. The response now seems to be that Treasury Ministers have agreed to a scheme by which a proportion of the sums from drug smugglers' assets could be used in the anti-drugs context. We are told that, although 13 international confiscation agreements have been made, as yet no funds are flowing from the initiative. We can only hope that such procedures will be developed with the passage of time.

I appreciate the desire of the Minister to be cautious, wanting to proceed year by year. I hope that his efforts will be successful and will help to protect the youth of the country from the trafficking scum who would destroy it.

One of the most damning reports of the year was on the Energy Efficiency Office. Any body that sets itself up with such a title is leading with its chin, and I regret to say that we found little efficiency and not much energy. The report is damning because it questions whether the Energy Efficiency Office should have been in existence for the past five or six years. No targets were set, monitoring was suspect, to say the least, and there was no co-ordination among Departments to see whether there was any relative progress or whether best practice was spreading. The situation was summed up in a sentence in paragraph 10 of the report, which said, with that typical understatment that is part of the PAC's raison d'etre:

"we question whether the Energy Efficiency Office as presently constituted and run can secure the objectives set out by the Secretary of State and achieve value for money."

I read that to mean that it has been wasting its time, and nothing that came out of the evidence convinced me to the contrary. But in the belief that hope springs eternal, the Committee added:

"We emphasise that we expect the Energy Efficiency Office to exercise close central direction and monitoring of the initiative and to provide advice to departments on best energy efficiency and practices."

That must happen if that office, which should be a vital organisation, is to have any purpose, and need exist, in the future.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) referred to the 31st report, entitled "Quality Control of Road and Bridge Construction", which links, in my view, with the 28th report of the previous year on the backlog of maintenance of motorways and trunk roads. Like other hon. Members, I raise the issue because of the main roads that run through our constituencies and cause grief and aggravation. My constituency is bisected by the M25, at times the largest car park in the United Kingdom. I share my constituents' anguish and aggravation because of their belief that they are paying the price for the sins of the forerunners in the Department of Transport.

The saga of deferred maintenance continues. The problem was highlighted in the report of two years ago. Our last report showed more clearly that not sufficient attention had been given to design life and quality of maintenance. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), a member of the Committee exposed the lack of quality of maintenance. I recommend hon. Members in all parts of the House to read his cross-examining on page 7 of that report. He highlighted two cases, one of plinth-bearing replacements and the other of spaghetti junction, where there were impressive overruns—if one can regard any excess of expenditure of public money as impressive—of taxpayers' money.

Although sanctions are available to the Department, there is a feeling that they are being used sparingly. For example, we noted that, despite the many failures in producing the correct level of support in exercising maintenance contracts, the reliance by the Department on the sanction of banning contractors or consulting engineers from tendering had been imposed only once in recent years and that few warnings had been issued. I suggest that the Department takes a tougher line when dealing with overruns on contracts and with faulty and shoddy work.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne took issue with the Treasury minute on design life and the relevant cost of quality improvement on initial installation. I support him in that. The matter remains unresolved. I fear that the saga will continue to run as the whole question of the maintenance and repair of roads and bridges returns for consideration by our Committee.

I shall not go over that ground again, except to say that I found it remarkably callous that the Department's calculations did not take into account the heavy cost of delays incurred by the travelling public and industry. We must treat the travelling public with the correct attitude because they pay for the maintenance that in turn pays for all the jobs connected with the Department. More consideration of those who use the roads would not go amiss.

As I said, this whole debate contains a rich vein of information that need never run out in the time scale available to us. I have highlighted a few issues that are of importance and that I found interesting during the year. Other hon. Members have adduced their thoughts. I join others in expressing appreciation to our Chairman, the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, for the gentle yet firm way in which he guides us. I am sorry that occasionally he finds it necessary to issue the 15-minute warning, but if he did not do so we should on many occasions not conclude our deliberations before midnight.

8.58 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): Let me associate myself and my hon. Friends with the remarks made by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the late Ian Gow. Ian was cruelly murdered, and I condemn unreservedly both the murder and the murderers.

The Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee described Ian Gow as a valuable member of the Committee, and also referred to his hard work and wise counsel. He was an able parliamentary opponent. Following his resignation from the Government on a point of principle, he took a particular interest in Treasury matters, and was always available to bat for the Government side in our little skirmishes over taxation policies.

I shall miss Ian's contributions to Treasury debates very much. I found out that, as well as being a tough and formidable opponent, he was—as has already been said—a very kind and a very nice man. We are diminished by his death, and also by the manner of it.

I welcome the Financial Secretary to his new job. I hope that he is not offended by the level of attendance tonight; it is actually quite good for the concluding stages of a Public Accounts Committee debate, and I am sure that that is a tribute to him. We have all come to hear his debut from the Treasury Front Bench. I welcome him on behalf of the Opposition, and look forward to hearing his contribution later.

Let me also express my thanks to the Committee for its work, as I have done in the last three Public Accounts Committee debates in which I have replied for the Opposition. I especially thank the Chairman of the Committee, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). The PAC is a hard-working Committee, but it is kept going by his diligence and enthusiasm as Chairman: that is very much appreciated. We also appreciate his approach to the work of the Committee—work that is considered, reflective and courteous, and brings about the unanimity that is so important to the integrity and power that the Committee's reports carry.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) on having got his hands on the Committee's papers, and also on being the only non-member of the Committee to take part in this debate. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about David Trimble?"] It seems that I am mistaken: the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) is also to be congratulated.

It was quite difficult to obtain copies of the Committee papers during the summer. While I realise that Committee members are familiar with them, if they were more easily available to those who do not serve on the Committee, perhaps other hon. Members would be more likely to take part in our debates. I rather agree with the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page): if more hon. Members realised what a seam there is to tap, there might be a better attendance and a broader range of contributions.

I was sorry to learn that the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) is retiring at the next general election; I wish him well in his retirement. He has been a regular contributor to our debates in this Parliament, and, if he is here for the next debate, I shall be able to wish him well again.

The Chairman described the Committee as a kind of "training scheme" for Labour Members from the 1983-87 intake who have gone on to take starring roles in our Front-Bench team. I am now something of an old lag: this is my fourth year of responding to these debates, and my third Financial Secretary. I do not think that I am wearing them down, as they have all gone on to greater things, and I am sure that the new one will as well.

There are certain recurring themes in these debates. The Ministry of Defence figures prominently this year, as it has previously; so do the affairs of Northern Ireland. The issue of fraud is perhaps not quite as prominent as it was in the previous two years, but it nevertheless features in some of the reports.

There are two further issues that are defined not by Department or by type, but in a more general way. The first is the issue of public expenditure foolishly forgone, which is dealt with in several reports. I am trying to introduce the word "Lamontable" into the English language to describe such public expenditure foollishly forgone, and I shall continue to do so. The word has not been taken up yet but, with grit and determination, I shall manage to get it into the dictionary.

The other feature which becomes all too clear from the reports is implementation of Government policy clashing with the best interests of the public purse. That is especially noticeable in the reports dealing with privatisation.

First, I shall deal with the report on matters relating to Northern Ireland. The Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee took us all back when he referred to the report on the De Lorean affair. He then invited us to get inside one of those De Loreans and go "Back to the Future", to examine similar affairs.

Reference was made to the paving stone accident claims in Northern Ireland. Hon. Members may recall that there was a time when just about every house in Belfast seemed to contain someone who had fallen down and had a claim against the state for injuring their knees. The previous Public Accounts Committee report dealing with social security matters in the Province could have been mentioned. That report set out the problems clearly, but conclusions seemed to be a little further away. I notice that the Treasury response to that report was not very encouraging either.

Other issues that the Public Accounts Committee will have to consider in future will certainly include progress on the AOR1 contract, compared with the original promises made.

The hon. Member for Scarborough referred to the land registry in Northern Ireland, which failed to put up the fees to cover its costs. That is a simple problem, but it should have been picked up long before it was.

Another report before us today deals with plants and with microfilm. Although the sum of money involved is not vast when compared to sums mentioned in other reports, the word "astonished" is used—and that is strong language from the Public Accounts Committee.

When studying all these issues, I found a key theme—it is supervision: checking and monitoring and intense and continuing audit. I suspect that that is not as easy to achieve in Northern Ireland as it is to say in a debate. I strongly support the hon. Member for Scarborough, who said that the tests that we apply to Northern Ireland should be no different from those we apply elsewhere in Britain. That is right but it is not easy, and the House should be aware of the difficulties while we keep that purpose firmly in front of us.

Before leaving the subject of Northern Ireland, it is worth referring briefly to the 30th report of the Public Accounts Committee about collection of the broadcast receiving licence fee—the BBC TV licence. It says:

"We are very concerned at the current level of licence evasion and regard it as unacceptable."

I suspect that that was also said back in 1985. The report goes on to point out:

"We note that, although only some 1 million households have black and white televisions 1·8 million monochrome licences were issued last year."

That fact caught my attention and I am sure that of other hon. Members. What conclusions are we to draw from it? The Public Accounts Committee drew the obvious conclusion. When I read through that report I was reminded of the debate that we had earlier about the road fund licence and its collection. It said that the penalty for non-payment is less severe than paying the licence fee. We have been told that events have not moved on since the Public Accounts Committee last considered the matter. We seem to be getting stuck. I hope that the Committee will not come forward in the next Parliament, or three years into it, and tell us that it is worried about the level of licence evasion and regards it as unacceptable.

There must be a response to these licence issues, whether it be the road fund licence or the BBC's television licence, that goes further than letting the problem drift and noting that it is still a problem in two or three years' time. The problem is not unrelated to the problems in Northern Ireland, where the level of evasion is substantially higher than it is in other parts of the United Kingdom.

The most important report before us is the Public Accounts Committee's sixth report on the sale of Rover Group plc to British Aerospace plc. Both the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said that this is an interim report which poses questions; it does not reach definitive conclusions about them. I fully accept that the Public Accounts Committee has more work to do. Nevertheless, they are powerful questions and to some extent almost lead to their own conclusions. Good and plausible answers will have to be given to them. The hon. Member for Uxbridge did his best to provide them in his speech.

The questions that my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, rightly raised were: why not accept competition in order to obtain the best price? There is a departmental response to that question, although how convincing the Committee finds it will be a matter for further consideration. The Department needs to justify its policy of exclusivity.

My right hon. Friend also asked what evidence there was that the public option would be damaging and why the other offers were not followed up in a closed competition. The Department said that competitive tendering involves risk. That is not the line that Conservative Governments usually adopt. Normally we are told that competitive tendering is good and that it should be embraced rather than thoroughly avoided, as it was in this case.

A number of other questions were asked. Since the Department did not have the benefit of competition to determine a fair price, the Committee asked why it did not carry out an evaluation of all the assets of the company. That was a fair question, and there was a response to it. The Public Accounts Committee will have to consider carefully precisely what assessment to make of that response.

A number of other questions fall into the same category. The Public Accounts Committee asked the Department why it was prepared to accept a settlement that the European Commission showed it was possible to improve. It asked the Department why it had based all its negotiations on profit forecasts at the lower end of the Rover Group's profit forecasts when the company was forecasting a range of profits in 1988 of between £37·5 million and £65 million. The Committee also asked about the Rover Group's stakes in nine associated companies.

A question that in particular caught my eye was the one which was put to the chairman of Barings. He was asked to explain the disparity between his company's evaluation of Istel at £8 million to £10 million and the fact that it was disposed of shortly after the sale for £39 million.

The Committee also asked the Department why it had not sold off the surplus land that was not connected with making motor cars before the Rover Group was put up for sale. The Department told the PAC that, at the time of the sale, there was only one such site—Bathgate—and that that remained the case. In subsequent written evidence, the Department confirmed that it had been aware of moves to close down a further three sites in time.

The Department told the PAC that it did not carry out an evaluation of the Rover Group's shares in these companies early in 1988 when British Aerospace made its initial offer for the company. The Department was unable to put a precise figure on the value to British Aerospace of the Rover Group's tax benefits—a significant issue.

My right hon. Friend also referred to the fact that, in the case of the sale of the Rover Group, no provision was made for the Government to claw back from British Aerospace within a prescribed period some part of any unforeseen financial benefits accruing from the sale of surplus sites or shareholdings, or the use of tax benefits.

The hon Member for Uxbridge referred to the date for final payment. He seemed to take that particularly seriously, and I share his view. The Public Accounts Committee asked the Department why it had not been announced publicly. The replies that the Department is giving to that and other questions relating to our relationship with the European Community do not show our country in a very good light. The Public Accounts Committee inquired why details of the additional £38 million were not reported to the European Commission. The Department replied that it thought it better not to draw attention to them at the time, since it did not want to take the risk of reopening the deal.

Anything that gives our Common Market partners misgivings about the way in which we conduct public administration is to be deplored. I seem to remember saying this to the hon. Member for Uxbridge last year, but, while I do not want to pre-empt the eventual findings of the Public Accounts Committee, there is clearly enormous cause for concern. I look forward with considerable interest to the outcome.

On the question of land sales and the valuation of assets, I must say that the Department could have been warned by the previous inquiry that the Public Accounts Committee carried out, into the sale, again to British Aerospace, of the royal ordnance factories. In its 13th report, the Committee concluded:

"Nevertheless, we consider that the Department might have been in a better position to evaluate the bids received if they had: (a) carried out a further revaluation as at about December 1986; (b) invited bids for the Company both with and without a clawback provision; (c) obtained an estimate of potential development values, particularly for Waltham Abbey and Enfield".

It is bad enough for the issues to appear in the sale of the Royal Ordnance factories. To have those aspects reappear in a further privatisation exercise will take a great deal of defending before the Committee.

[Mr. Nicholas Brown]

In an effort to get the word "Lamontable" into the English language—it is a worthy cause, which I am sure has the wholehearted support of the House—I turn to the 31st report of the Public Accounts Committee, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) referred. As he said, it is not simply a matter of inconvenience to road users when they find that the road or bridge on which they are travelling is taken up for maintenance. There are enormous costs for industry, not least the cost of lorry drivers who are on fixed time and are being delayed. As my right hon. Friend said, the whole thing is unnecessary. As he pointed out, the Treasury minute dealing with premature corrosion is almost Sir Humphrey Appleby "Yes Minister" stuff.

One of the advantages of having had to respond for the Opposition every year for four years is that I was able to consider the report alongside an earlier report on the maintenance and construction of motorways. The Department of Transport will have to take seriously the conclusions of the Public Accounts Committee's reports. In paragraph 2(iii), the Public Accounts Committee says:

"We are concerned that since there has been little systematic investigation of the causes and costs of premature maintenance, the Department may not be in a position to take full account of unforeseen repairs and premature maintenance in their cost benefit analysis or in setting standards for road construction."

That is extraordinarily serious. We heard something similar to that when we were considering the motorway programme. I hope that that is taken seriously in both the Department of Transport and the Treasury. It surely represents public expenditure that should have been made to avoid substantially greater sums of public expenditure later.

Similarly, my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West referred to the report on financial problems at universities, and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) made an important point when he said that this report echoes an earlier report and referred to the gap between May 1988 and February 1990. It is not sufficient to know what is going wrong; we must address it and put it right. The tributes that were paid to those who are currently struggling with the problems at University college, Cardiff, were justified. Efforts are being made to respond to the specific problems that the report outlined.

A report that struck a chord with me because it related to an earlier report was the one on the Metropolitan police estate. Two years ago, one of the most horrific Public Accounts Committee reports that I have seen was produced on the financing of the Metropolitan police. The current report complements that earlier investigation. The Public Accounts Committee said:

"We consider that the poor condition of the Metropolitan Police's operational estate is unacceptable, and that this almost certainly hinders efficiency and effectiveness."

That comment was made at a time when public concern about crime was rising substantially, as is crime itself.

The report continues:

"We are not satisfied that even within the funds available, effective management of the estate has been given the care and attention it clearly requires . . . We endorse the Metropolitan Police's acceptance of the fact that, though cutting back on maintenance seems an immediate, easy option, it is in the long term a damaging and expensive one."

That is a message that I try to convey to the Department of Transport; it is certainly right in this context.

The report continues:

"We are concerned that the Metropolitan Police have over the years built up an extensive land bank of valuable sites without having determined a clear strategy and timetable for bringing them into use."

The Government's response to that and further points made in the report is to accept most of the Public Accounts Committee's findings and say that all will be put right when money is available. Money will have to be made available, or substantially higher sums will have to be made available later. Again, a little public expenditure that is forgone now will cost the public purse much more later.

Mr. Shersby: The report of the Metropolitan police estate was of considerable interest—I declare my interest as parliamentary adviser to the Police Federation. It has resulted in several sites that were held by the Metropolitan police estate either being developed for the purpose for which they were originally intended or being disposed of as part of a disposal programme. There are too many rundown police stations in London that need urgent attention, and money realised as a result of sales can be used for that purpose.

It might amuse the hon. Gentleman that, on one famous occasion, two members of staff were standing in the window of the National Audit Office. One said to the other, "I wonder who owns that site across the road." They decided to find out and discovered that it was owned by the Metropolitan police and that it was being used as a car park. The hon. Gentleman will be glad to know that it will be redeveloped as the new Gerald road police station, the purpose for which it was originally intended.

Mr. Brown: That is pleasing news. It is particularly pleasing that proceeds from the sale of those sites can be used to improve police stations or to develop other police stations. That is an obvious answer to the problem, but it is not one that obtains throughout public administration, as any councillor could tell the hon. Gentleman.

As it is "after eight", I shall briefly consider the report on the Royal Mint. I was much taken by this report because I originally thought that the idea was pretty daft. The report tells us:

"In 1987 the Mint launched the Britannia gold coin, which they expected to make a major contribution to their sales and profits. However, they significantly overestimated the demand for it and, despite advertising and promotion expenditure of over £3·5 million, it produced a profit of only £100,000 on sales of £63-64 million in 1987-88. We therefore asked the Mint why they had embarked on this enterprise."

That seems a fair question. The answer is in the following paragraph:

"We were told that it was a Ministerial decision taken in the early part of 1987".

In other words, this was some daft idea of the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson). It might have had a better chance of success if the right hon. Gentleman had not gone on to slap VAT on gold coins and if there had not been a fall in the price of gold which reduced the bullion market overnight. These are the people to whom we entrust the management of the economy!

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Since then, it has become clear that the statement that we received from the Department concerned was in error about VAT. VAT had changed some years before.

Mr. Brown: That spoils what was otherwise quite a good shot. Never mind, the principle remains true—the idea was daft. Better care should be taken in weighing up the commercial prospects of these ventures before embarking on them, regardless of when VAT was imposed.

The last report to which I want to refer is of particular sadness to me. In the last Parliament, I served my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) as his deputy in the Labour party's legal affairs team. That duty brought me to serve on the Committee on the Prosecution of Offences Bill which set up the Crown prosecution service. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury will perhaps remember all that fairly well. I think that he was involved at some stage, although I cannot remember whether he was on the Committee.

The Crown prosecution service was set up in a bipartisan spirit. It was approved by both sides of the House. We all made speeches wishing it and the Bill well. Although there were questions we wanted to ask and points we wanted to explore with the Government, the Bill's passage was not unduly obstructed. However, the Opposition were worried about rates of pay for solicitors who were to work in the service. We felt that the Government had underestimated the costs of staffing and were underfunding the service. We expressed particular concern about the way in which the relationship between chief police officers and the Crown prosecution service would develop.

All those points have been picked up by the Public Accounts Committee. It saddens me that aspects that we thought would go wrong have gone wrong. The report states:

"We are disturbed at the very high cost of employing agent lawyers, especially where their performance has been less satisfactory".

We hoped that staff of the Crown prosecution service would be wholly in-house and that it would not be necessary to employ agent lawyers, except in special circumstances.

The report continues:

"We were concerned to learn that, despite the steps taken to establish effective liaison between the Crown Prosecution Service and the police, consultation and feedback were still being hindered by inadequate communication and, in the view of the Crown Prosecution Service, the late delivery of files from the police."

It was always important for the functioning of the new Crown prosecution service that the service and the police helped each other and understood the new relationship that was supposed to exist between the two. Clearly, that has not worked out as well as the Government and the Opposition hoped.

The Public Accounts Committee continues:

"We are disturbed at the large proportion of discontinued cases which were not dropped until the court hearing."

The cost of that must be substantial. Clearly, it is up to the Crown prosecution service, to the police and to the court authorities to co-operate to ensure that there is a substantial reduction of such cases. I wholeheartedly endorse that recommendation by the Committee, which also says:

"We were disappointed to learn that the Crown Prosecution Service had failed to secure the improved standard of case preparation it was expected to achieve over previous prosecution arrangements."

Perhaps the most serious and worrying point in the report is when the Committee says that the estimates have proved to be far too low. It says:

"Nevertheless, we are concerned that the estimates proved to be far too low and that the Service appears to be costing almost twice as much as the previous prosecution arrangements, with a staff requirement practically double the size originally envisaged. In these circumstances we find it surprising that, more than two and a half years after becoming operational, the service has not fully met the initial objectives set by the Government mainly because it still did not have enough staff."

The Public Accounts Committee is exploring a worrying point there.

The duty of replying on such matters in the House falls to the Attorney-General, although, of course, the Crown prosecution service is still administered from the Lord Chancellor's Department. I hope that heed is taken of the report. The whole House wishes the Crown prosecution service well, but we want our wishes to be put into effect and not undermined, as seems to be happening.

I want again to express our wholehearted gratitude to the Committee for the substantial time that it has put into examining these matters on our behalf. I reiterate our thanks to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee for his leadership, and for the sense of direction and of unity of purpose with which he provides his fellow Committee members.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Francis Maude): I join all those who have paid tribute to the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) for the distinguished chairmanship that he has brought to the Committee over the past seven years. Several members of the Public Accounts Committee and others have said that the role of the Committee may never have been more important. I have no doubt that that owes a great deal to the objective and determined way in which the right hon. Gentleman conducts his business. The whole House owes him a debt of gratitude for the work that he leads in that way.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the high turnover of members of the Public Accounts Committee—especially of Opposition Members—and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) referred to the high turnover of Financial Secretaries. He seems to have accounted for three so far in the course of the four debates in which he has taken part. I look forward to taking part in a great many more of these debates as Financial Secretary. I enjoyed this debate because it demonstrated how seriously the members of the Public Accounts Committee take their work and it emphasised the importance of that work.

There is one former member of the Public Accounts Committee whose absence tonight is conspicuous and tragic. I refer, of course, to our friend Ian Gow. I was proud to count him a friend and a colleague. He leaves a gap in our hearts that can never be filled.

My hon. Friends the Members for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) and for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) predicted—I do not know whether gloomily or otherwise—that this debate may be their valedictory occasion as members of the Public Accounts Committee speaking in such a debate. The House owes both of them a debt of gratitude for their work. They have been distinguished members of the Committee and have brought to it great clarity of mind and expertise. I know that the Committee will miss that. I was going to say, "we". I believe that I am now a member of the Public Accounts Committee. I hope that I may be forgiven for not yet having appeared at a sitting as I became a member of it only on Tuesday of this week. I believe that I have a respectable alibi.

All Ministers, particularly Treasury Ministers, are conscious of the need to ensure propriety and value for money in the spending of taxpayers' money. The Public Accounts Committee has an exceptionally important role to play in both those areas. In the area of propriety and regularity, it is rightly concerned to ensure that the funds that the House votes to the Executive are spent only for the purposes that the House has authorised and are properly accounted for.

On value for money, it has been a major objective of the Government since they came to power to improve the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of public spending. In that respect also, the Government and the Public Accounts Committee have common objectives. The financial management initiative launched in 1982 is a continuing programme to promote efficiency and value for money by placing responsibility as far as possible at the level where operations and activities are managed and delivered. It therefore seeks to provide managers with a framework of objectives of output and performance measures, cost information, training and expert advice. Within that framework, managers are responsible for making the best use of resources and achieving the greatest value for money.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred in particular to six reports and I shall deal first with Northern Ireland and the nursery and the microfilming contract. All who have spoken recognise that the Housing Executive carries out a substantial and successful housing programme, sometimes in exceptionally difficult circumstances. But the Committee's criticisms were clear and stark and have been accepted. Remedial steps have been taken to ensure that nothing similar happens in future. The right hon. Gentleman said that it was unusual for the Committee to express its astonishment. I concede that astonishment registers high on the Committee's Richter scale. If I may say so, the words were not misused. The Government accept that there were important lessons to be learnt from that episode and I assure the House and the Committee that they have been learnt.

The second report referred to by the right hon. Gentleman related to the financial problems at universities, particularly at University college, Cardiff. The circumstances that led to the Department of Education and Science's intervention in the affairs of University college, Cardiff, were exceptional. Mismanagement by senior college staff put the institution in severe financial difficulties with an increasingly great deficit. As the Committee's first report acknowledged, when the Department had incontrovertible evidence in late 1985 of those exceptional circumstances from the then University Grants Committee, decisive action to remedy that was instigated.

It became clear that the only route to effective survival was the merger, which I understand had been long mooted with the University of Wales Institute of Science and Technology. That merger took place in 1989. It was supported by some extra funds, but subject to stringent conditions, to ensure a fresh start. Of the £11 million new funds, £4·4 million was in the form of a repayable grant to be repaid by the new institution using its best endeavours to sell surplus assets and by the recovery of certain other sums. The new institution has made a good start from difficult origins. To date, some £1 million of that £4·4 million loan has been repaid to the Exchequer.

Since the education reforms, monitoring has been undertaken by the Universities Funding Council and there have been several key changes. The lines of accountability have been clarified. The UFC has its own accounting officer and its relations with the universities are governed by financial memoranda. Universities are required to provide appropriate financial monitoring data and, in any case, now have a standard format for their accounts. The UFC has strengthened its financial expertise, including the establishment of an internal audit unit, to scrutinise all of those. In the unlikely event of another institution beginning to suffer the same kind of mismanagement, the UFC should be able to detect that quickly and act appropriately. However, under the Education Reform Act 1988, its powers of intervention are not unfettered. Parliament insisted that proper allowance should be made for the autonomy of universities.

I want now to consider the sixth interim report on the sale of Rover Group to British Aerospace. I have no doubt that the Government acted wholly in the national interest by conducting that sale. I also have no doubt that it was carried out in a correct, defensible and justifiable way.

The sale fulfilled our objective of privatising the company within the lifetime of the current Parliament. It was our aim to relieve the taxpayer of the liability represented by the Varley-Marshall-Joseph assurances, which at the end of March 1988 were estimated at £1·6 billion and which were set to increase substantially. It was our aim to achieve that sale on the best possible terms and to achieve a clean break that would protect from further risk the taxpayer who had, it is worth remembering, already contributed some £2·9 billion to Rover Group.

We also aimed to achieve privatisation without exposing Rover Group to the uncertainty to which it had proved so vulnerable in the past. All our objectives have been achieved and, most importantly, Rover Group is now flourishing in the private sector. It has committed £500 million of new capital investment. Its new range of models has been highly successful and, with the introduction of three-shift working at Longbridge, record productivity levels have been attained. The contrast with British Leyland's miserable and depressing history in the public sector could hardly be sharper.

Mr. Terry Davis: Is not it true that Rover Group was already making substantial profits when it was publicly owned?

Mr. Maude: It was making a very modest operating profit, but that took no account of the wider financial circumstances, which were still pretty dire.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred particularly to price and exclusivity. It is worth pointing out that Rover Group was sold for £150 million and one of the conditions of sale was the implementation of the corporate plan involving £1·6 billion of new capital investment and the undertaking that no further public assistance would be given to the group.

Exclusive negotiating rights were therefore granted to British Aerospace and the reason for that exclusivity was perfectly clear. Competitive bidding would almost certainly have given rise to political controversy which, we must remember, had previously been extremely damaging to the commercial prospects of Rover Group. It would have undermined the realisable value of the business and put the broader objectives seriously at risk. The European Commission decided that £150 million was a reasonable purchase price for the company and that the granting of exclusive negotiating rights to British Aerospace had been justified. I have no doubt that the terms of sale represented the best that could realistically have been achieved.

When talking about clawback, the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne made a good point. He said that there is a difference between public and private money. I cannot remember his precise words, but I shall check on them because they expressed a good deal of truth. Broadly speaking, he said that one should not take risks with public money and that is precisely the point about the exclusivity. He went on to say, I think, that one should not take risks even if that means that one might receive slightly less as a result. That is the whole point about the exclusivity. We had been through the unhappy episode of a possible sale to Ford and General Motors, with all the uncertainty and the political controversy, which, if I may say so, was prompted to a large extent by Opposition Members, and which had caused serious damage to British Leyland as the group was then known. It was perfectly justifiable, in the interests of the taxpayer and of the company, to avoid such controversy being renewed.

Over recent years, the PAC has taken a close interest in the privatisation of royal ordnance factories. We welcome that interest. It is right that, when public companies are privatised, the Committee should consider whether a fair return has been obtained for the taxpayer. I particularly welcome the Committee's 13th report. Its considered conclusions about the sale provide a welcome corrective to the more sensational claims that appeared in the media.

The company was sold as a going concern after a wide-ranging and open bidding competition. We are confident that the price that we received was a true reflection of its market value. Not one of the major commercial companies involved in the bidding thought it worth paying more than that for the company with all its assets and liabilities.

I now refer to the 16th report on financial management in the national health service. Like management as a whole in the NHS, financial management is now focused on implementing the recent reforms. The Committee's observations about financial management in the NHS have been at the forefront of planning for the reformed NHS. The reforms will demand sharply improved financial management. That requirement has been a feature of all aspects of their implementation. An upgraded system of financial planning and monitoring is being put in place, supported by a substantial investment of time and effort in staff training.

A principal objective of the new systems is to provide the means to ensure that health authorities keep in financial balance in the new competitive environment. An NHS that has its finances in balance will not seek to fund its activities at the expense of creditors. The monitoring of efficiency savings is part of the financial monitoring package. An objective of the reforms is to achieve better value for money. Continued pursuit and achievement of efficiency savings will play an important part in securing that goal.

Good financial management in the NHS requires the commitment of all managers from the management executive down, a clear expression from the top of the priority of such financial management, translation of that commitment and priority into systems that will support management in that task, and the recruitment, retention and training of suitable staff to operate the systems.

Mr. Michael Morris: My hon. Friend will be aware that in the recommendations is the poignant point that the health service has previously been a bad payer, particularly in relation to small businesses. May we have an assurance that, in respect of the Treasury, in the difficult financial climate at the moment, when a level playing field is supposed to be achieved, it will not be to the disadvantage of suppliers to the health service?

Mr. Maude: We should certainly expect it not to be such a problem in future.

I now refer to the value of the land and concern about whether the NHS knew of the value of its estate. One of the reforms to be introduced from April next year is capital charges intended to make the NHS take account of the value of its capital assets. As part of the preparation for the introduction of capital charges, all district health authorities have had to draw up asset registers recording the value of their land and other capital assets. The land has been valued by district valuers.

I now refer to the last report—the 31st report—on road and bridge construction. I first deal with the Chairman's point about delay in the most recent Treasury minute. It was laid before the House, and copies were provided for members of the Committee on Monday of this week, on the first day after the recess. As a newcomer, I understand that it is the long-standing practice not to issue Treasury minutes responding to Committee reports during the recess. I am sorry if the rather earlier timing of the debate after the recess has caused a difficulty.

There was criticism of maintenance being carried out earlier than forecast at the time of construction. There are three important general points to make about this premature maintenance. Premature maintenance costs are very small in relation to the cost of construction, and simply spending more money on the construction does not necessarily avoid premature maintenance.

Civil engineering, of course, inevitably involves risks. The bulk of premature maintenance referred to in the report was caused by factors that were unforseeable or uncertain at the time of construction. We do not knowingly or avoidably build defective roads and bridges.

A certain amount of action was taken in any event before the PAC report was published. Standards, specifications, materials and techniques were kept under constant review and improvements were regularly introduced when justified. A good deal of action has been taken since the publication of the report, including the introduction of an improved computerised reporting system for all defects and all premature maintenance, concentrating on the few cases where there is substantial evidence of significant failure, by consulting engineers or contractors to obtain all costs that are legally recoverable.

[Mr. Maude]

An independent consultant was appointed to carry out a wide-ranging review of the means of redress of poor supervision and workmanship, including the use of sanctions.

Certainly problems have arisen after constructing some sections of modern trunk roads and bridges, but many of the problems identified by the Committee will not recur. We must not overlook the fact that maintenance of many roads and bridges is completely trouble-free. Government constantly strive to secure better value from the huge current investment in the roads programme. To meet the demands of modern traffic flows, we work at the frontier of engineering knowledge. New materials and techniques normally still offer significant net benefits, even after allowing for premature maintenance.

This has been a useful debate in focusing attention on the valuable work of the PAC. I should like to pay a final tribute to the work of the Committee and to that of the Comptroller and Auditor General and to the National Audit Office for its essential support. I thank all members of the Committee who have spoken in the debate and the two gallant hon. Members who are not members of the Committee but who have also made valuable speeches.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the 34th to 41st Reports of the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 1988-89, of the 1st to 32nd Reports of Session 1989-90, and of the Treasury Minutes and Northern Ireland Department of Finance and Personnel Memoranda on those Reports (Cm. 963, 964, 1057, 1101, 1150, 1235 and 1247) with particular reference to the following Reports:

1988-89

Thirty-sixth, Further matters relating to Northern Ireland;

1989-90

First, Financial problems at universities;

Sixth, Sale of Rover Group to British Aerospace plc;

Thirteenth, Ministry of Defence: Further examination of the Sale of Royal Ordnance plc;

Sixteenth, Financial Management in the National Health Service;

Thirty-first, Quality control of road and bridge construction.

Mecca Tunnel Disaster

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

9.52 pm

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I wish to raise in this brief Adjournment debate a subject which is probably the saddest constituency case that I have raised in my 17 years' membership of the House.

On 2 July there was a widely reported disaster at Mecca involving religious pilgrims in a pedestrian tunnel. The first reports that I saw—I have since checked them—indicated that up to 100 people had died, but this figure climbed within a day to well over 1,400.

King Fahd of Saudi Arabia caused additional news coverage of the disaster by his remark that the disaster was "God's will" and "had the victims not died in the tunnel they would have died elsewhere at the same predestined moment".

The Saudi authorities were quoted on 3 July as saying, "Everything is under control". That statement can be taken several ways, but that is not the purpose of this debate and neither can I go into the reasons for the disaster. What I want to raise is the involvement of British citizens as victims—injured or missing—in the disaster. Given the nature of the pilgrimage, it is clear that other nationalities must likewise be affected.

On the evening of 20 September, I was contacted by my constituent, 17-year-old Zubia Waheed, on behalf of her family. The following day I met Zubia and learned that she and her five brothers and sisters aged between four and 13 had not heard from their mother and father since 2 July. Their parents are British citizens, Mr. Abdul Whaid Khan and his wife, Mrs. Munawar Sultana. The couple had arrived for the pilgrimage in Saudi Arabia on 19 June and were due back home on 23 July. They had telephoned home virtually every day since their arrival to make sure that things were okay. However, since 2 July their names have not appeared on any list of the dead or injured.

They have not been located in any of the hospitals. Furthermore, they have not been identified or located by friends and relatives from photographs taken of the victims. Relatives of the family have travelled from Pakistan to check the photographs in Saudi Arabia because friends of the family living in the United Kingdom have been refused visas to visit Saudi Arabia to check for themselves.

The only figure that I have seen for the number of victims is 1,426 but more than 3,500 photographs of victims have been checked to try to trace the couple. I understand that the counting stopped at 3,500. There were still more photographs to count, although all the photographs had been checked. Last Friday I was given a similar figure for the number of victims by a friend in Birmingham. He was the leader of a group of pilgrims in Saudi Arabia at the same time. He told me that it was common knowledge that over 3,000 people died in the tunnel disaster.

I have met my young constituent Zubia on three occasions. She is a credit to her parents and to the youth of this country—a view shared by every member of the statutory authorities that have come into contact with the young lady in recent weeks. She has given up her course at the local college to look after the other children. But they all, including Zubia, have two simple questions—"Where are mum and dad? When are they coming back?"

Within an hour of my first meeting with the family I telephoned the Foreign Office. Like many people, I remember the press reports of the disaster in July. After that there was nothing at all. There was no reason to suppose that British citizens had been involved. There had been no press reports and no investigations. When I telephoned the Foreign Office and said who I was and that I was telephoning about the Mecca tunnel disaster, Jacqueline Walder of the consular section told me who I was phoning about. She told me the names of my constituents before I gave them. That indicated clearly to me that the Foreign Office staff in London were on top of the matter. The issue was clearly on the desk. Obviously, the family and friends of my constituents had been in contact with the Foreign Office before approaching me in September. That must be contrasted with the attitude of the Saudi Arabian authorities, particularly the Saudi embassy in London. It was asked by The Independent newspaper on 5 October about the disaster and the questions that obviously flow about the dead and injured were put to it. The response from the press office of the Saudi embassy was

"God, what's brought this back?"

I believe, as would anyone who read the article, that the matter should never have gone away in the first place. It is clear that there are disputes about the number of victims and that people cannot be accounted for and are missing.

I have subsequently discovered that several other British citizens were involved in the disaster. I presume that the Minister will give us the latest available figures. I have spoken to people in other parts of the country. I spoke at the weekend to Mrs. Shamin, of Nelson in Lancashire, whose husband Mr. Nadir Ali Khan, a British citizen, also disappeared on 2 July without trace. She was with her husband on the pilgrimage but she was not with him that day because her health is not good. She remained behind for several weeks in Saudi Arabia to search for her husband. She also, bless her, came across friends of my constituents and arranged for photographs of Zubia's parents to be sent out to her so that she could look among the photographs when she was searching for her husband —also to no avail.

I contacted the Saudi embassy in London on Monday morning to inform it as a matter of courtesy that I intended to raise this issue tonight. In my letter, I gave an indication of the type of questions that I expected the Minister to be able to answer. What was the final death toll? Given that there were between 4,000 and 5,000 people in the tunnel and having seen the photographs, it is inconceivable that all the injured survived, but no figure beyond the first published has ever been given. How many of the dead and injured were British citizens? Above all, why are some British citizens totally unaccounted for? I told the embassy that Zubia and her brothers and sisters had received no help from the Saudi Government and that they had convinced themselves that their parents are alive.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

Mr. Rooker: Zubia and her brothers are convinced that their parents are alive and held in some kind of camp or in slavery. In recent months they have spent a small fortune telephoning the authorities in Saudi Arabia.

The fears of Zubia and her brothers are backed up by a known case of another citizen of Birmingham who went on a pilgrimage last year but could not get back to this country until this year. A woman in another part of Birmingham—not in my constituency—was forced to skivvy in a hotel for several months to make ends meet. The local community in Birmingham knows about such cases and thus there are great fears when people go missing.

I told the ambassador that I am not a diplomat but that my job is to push the case of my constituent as hard as I can so that the Foreign Office tells the Saudi Government that this problem must be settled. I told the ambassador that the lack of information from his Government is bound to give rise to fears in this country that Saudis believe that human life is cheap—one might say too cheap to count.

The Saudi Government have contributed to the lack of reporting by the media of the consequences of the disaster, its aftermath and its effect on the families because they do not allow journalists in to make inquiries. Journalists who asked questions after the disaster were thrown out.

People of Birmingham who visit Saudi Arabia regularly are of the opinion that the Saudi Government are incompetent and arrogant when dealing with visitors. It is certain that no Saudi Member of Parliament will raise this matter in the Saudi Parliament.

We also need to know what inquiries and investigations have taken place inside Saudi Arabia. Where were the dead and injured taken? Has the Foreign Office sent any formal notes to the Saudi Ministry of Foreign Affairs? Has the ambassador in London been called to the Foreign Office to try to explain why British citizens are unaccounted for? It is also reasonable to ask whether our Government have had any contact with any other Governments whose citizens were similarly affected. The nature of the pilgrimages means that millions visit the holy places and, by and large, they are not citizens of Saudi Arabia, but come from all over the world.

It is now virtually on record that British citizens died in the disaster. Their families grieve and we grieve with them, but other British citizens have disappeared without trace. What are their families supposed to do? What of the future? What about documentation and compensation? The facts about what happenened to those citizens are crucial to their relatives so that they are able to live in the future.

Many other natural practical questions come to mind about the circumstances of the six children in my constituency. I do not want to raise the questions in public, but I put on record my grateful thanks for the speed and care with which the statutory authorities responded once alerted to the situation.

I cannot accept that constituents of mine and of other hon. Members—I am referring to British citizens—can simply disappear in an allied and friendly country such as that. The tunnel disaster of July 2 occurred a clear month before the invasion of Kuwait. While the invasion has, of course, put extra pressure on Government arrangements there, that is no excuse for inaction, delay and lack of response.

[Mr. Rooker]

I appreciate—one could not have been in public life and a Member of the House for nearly 17 years without appreciating—that Britain gives the Saudi Government the kid glove treatment on many issues. But I warn that grave offence will be caused to, and taken by, British citizens if we do not receive information and knowledge about what happened to our citizens in that country.

I hope that the Foreign Office has made that abundantly clear to the Saudi authorities. British citizens carrying British passports rely when the chips are down on those famous words on the inside cover of the passport. If those words are to have any meaning, the Saudi Government must realise that the issue will not go away until we know what has happened to the British citizens involved.

10.6 pm

The Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): I wish at the outset to thank the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) for raising the question of the tragic incident at Mecca on 2 July and express, through him, my sympathy with the families of his two constituents who failed to return from this year's Haj but about whom there is still no information, and to the family of one other British pilgrim who are in the same situation. I can well understand how they feel.

I wish also to express my deep sympathy to the families of the British pilgrims who so tragically died, and to those who were injured in the disaster in the Mowaisem tunnel. We were all stunned by the news of this terrible disaster, affecting so many pilgrims who were carrying out an act of the highest religious devotion.

Her Majesty the Queen and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister immediately sent messages of condolence to His Majesty King Fahd. That was before we knew of any British victims. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary sent a similar message to the Saudi Foreign Minister, His Royal Highness Prince Saud al Faisal. We did not know at that stage whether any British pilgrims had been involved.

The disaster struck when the pilgrims were returning from Muzdalifa to Mina, close outside the city of Mecca, on the day of sacrifice, the Eid al Adha. This journey takes pilgrims through the Mowaisem tunnel.

From what we learned from the Saudi authorities, a crowd built up just before 8 o'clock on the morning of 2 July in the area of the tunnel. The 600-metre tunnel, opened in 1979, had previously coped well enough with two-way crowd movements, but, tragically, the volume of traffic proved too much on this occasion.

Apparently, two major waves of people going in opposite directions converged just inside the western mouth of the tunnel. This led to a stampede and the death of many pilgrims. Many were suffocated or trampled in the crush. Some died when they were forced off the raised walkway at the tunnel's western approach. The Saudi authorities have put the total number of deaths at 1,426. Unofficial estimates put the death toll much higher.

I understand that the Saudi authorities have begun an inquiry to determine the causes of the tragedy. They have a difficult task. In the meantime, it would be wrong, indeed impossible, for me to try to anticipate their findings.

The numbers of pilgrims visiting Mecca for the Haj are of course very great indeed. Unofficial sources put the number of pilgrims at this year's Haj at between 1 and 2 million, half from overseas. The Haj authorities give the figure for British pilgrims as about 5,700, based on the number of United Kingdom passports; but many of the British pilgrims are dual nationals, and choose to travel to the holy places on their other passports. Our best estimate of the number of British pilgrims is about 10,000 people.

It may be helpful if I give the House an account of the action taken by our posts in Saudi Arabia in response to this tragic disaster. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Perry Barr for his words about the activities and support of the consular section of the Foreign Office. However, I should like to take the opportunity to rebut recent suggestions in the press of official indifference, and to tackle the implication that the Government are unconcerned about the fate of British Moslems killed in Mecca. I can refute that allegation totally.

As soon as we learned of the disaster on the afternoon of 2 July, before we had any knowledge of British casualties, the consulate in Jeddah tried to find out from the Saudi authorities and others exactly what had happened. Non-Moslems are not allowed into Mecca, so we were unable to send a United Kingdom-based member of staff; none the less, on the following day, 3 July, we sent the pro-consul—who is a Kenyan Moslem—to Mecca to gather first-hand information on the tragedy.

During his visits to Mecca in the days immediately following the tragedy, the pro-consul visited hospitals to look for United Kingdom pilgrims who might be injured. He made contact in Mecca with British pilgrim tour leaders, and was also in touch with the Saudi Haj Ministry. He had no reports of British deaths or injuries until 4 July, when he was able to confirm one death. A further six British deaths were confirmed on 5 July.

In the succeeding days, further casualties and deaths were reported and confirmed. We kept in close contact with the Haj Ministry. The pro-consul visited Mecca again on 11 July; in fact, he visited Mecca almost daily during the first fortnight of July.

Our ambassador in Riyadh subsequently called on the head of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' consular department and on the Deputy Minister of the Interior. The consulate-general in Jeddah remained in constant touch with both the European section of the Haj Ministry and the Indian and Pakistan sections in an effort to track down dual passport holders. Follow-up action with the Saudi Haj Ministry and with hospital authorities continued during August and September.

There were of course many telephone calls from the public to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and to our posts in Saudi Arabia. The hon. Member for Perry Barr has generously paid tribute to the service provided by our consular department, which kept in regular touch with relatives in the United Kingdom in the weeks succeeding the tragedy.

The British casualty figures now stand at 20 dead, and a further 14 British pilgrims were injured and treated in well equipped hospitals in Mecca; all, I am happy to say, have now been released.

Our posts in Riyadh and Jeddah are continuing, and will continue, to press the Haj authorities for more details. They have built up regular personal contacts with the Saudi officials involved: in our experience, that is the key to successful handling of a problem such as this. Most recently, the consul in Riyadh delivered personally a formal note to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs requesting urgent assistance in tracing the British citizens still missing. The Saudi authorities promised speedy action; we will press them on that.

As to compensation, which the hon. Member for Perry Barr mentioned, that is, of course, a matter for the Saudi authorities. However, the consulate general in Jeddah is pressing to establish where matters stand.

Until recently, six British pilgrims were unaccounted for. That number is now reduced to three. It is, of course, regrettable that any of the missing should remain unidentified, despite the best endeavours of our consular staff, who have pressed the Saudi authorities on every possible occasion, but we must recognise that the Saudi authorities have been working in very difficult conditions. They have been having to try to identify those buried by comparing photographs taken of the bodies before burial with those in the victims' passports.

This has been a difficult and lengthy task—not least because of the numbers involved. What is more, the pilgrims would have handed in their own passports to the Haj authorities, so would not have been carrying them at the time of the disaster. I have already mentioned the further complication that some British pilgrims have dual nationality and were travelling on other passports.

While there has been criticism of the way in which the Saudi authorities handled the disaster, we have also had reports from relatives that they were very helpful to those who were attempting to identify the bodies of their kin.

In conclusion, while I fully understand and share the concern of the hon. Member for Perry Barr, I must recall the very large number of victims of this disaster and the enormous difficulty the Saudis are having in identifying them. For our part, we are dependent on the Saudi authorities for information.

None of this, however, detracts from the pain which the relatives of those who are still unidentified must feel. The Government fully understand their wish to be able to satisfy themselves about this tragedy, so we shall continue to press the Saudi authorities, through the consulate-general in Jeddah and the embassy in Riyadh, and we shall, of course, pass on at once any information they receive to the relatives in this country. The Saudis have assured us that they will grant visas and assist families who wish to continue searching for information in Mecca themselves, and we will be glad to assist those applying for visas if necessary. Our consular staff in Jeddah will of course do everything possible to help, too.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes past Ten o'clock.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Points of Order

9.34 am

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday when a question was raised about the Prime Minister calling my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition a "crypto-communist", you said:

"Allow me to reflect upon the matter to see what can be done."—[Official Report, 18 October 1990; Vol. 177, c. 1394.]

Have you had a word from the Prime Minister about withdrawing that remark?

Mr. Speaker: I have not had a word from the Prime Minister, but I have reflected upon the matter. I have discovered a specific ruling on this point. On 5 May 1948 the Speaker ruled that it was not out of order for one hon. Member to refer to another as a crypto-communist. However, he deprecated personalised attacks. As I said when the matter was raised yesterday, it appeared to me that the Leader of the Opposition was amused rather than offended by what the Prime Minister said and I took the precaution of seeing the action replay on television this morning. Perhaps we should leave the matter there.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No. I have not yet finished. I must add that I do deprecate personal aspersions between hon. Members. For the benefit of the House I shall quote page 380 of "Erskine May" which states:

"Good temper and moderation are the characteristics of parliamentary language. Parliamentary language is never more desirable than when a Member is canvassing the opinions and conduct of his opponents in debate."

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is well known that in the House hon. Members comment about others and that on occasion hon. Members are penalised for making those remarks. I referred yesterday to the time when I was thrown out of the House for calling Doctor Death a pompous sod. It seems that the rules are changed according to who makes the remark. For example, what would your reaction be——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: —If I called——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: —the Prime Minister a crypto-fascist? Is that in "Erskine May"?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman sit down? I refer him to the precedents on this matter. If he looks up Hansard of 5 May 1948, he will see the exchanges that took place. Times have changed since 1948 and I repeat again——

Mr. Skinner: It depends who says it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: You dare not throw them out.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I again draw the attention of the whole House to the excerpt from "Erskine May" that I have just quoted. We should not cast personal aspersions on each other. I deprecate it. Hon. Members who saw the action replay on television this morning will have noted that there was a great deal of noise. The microphones amplify noise coming from the Back Benches on each side. It is not always possible in the Chair to hear remarks made in a soft voice.

Mr. Orme: Thank you for your comments, Mr. Speaker. It might benefit the House if the Prime Minister reads what has been said today. I see that the deputy Prime Minister is present. The Prime Minister might reconsider her remark and let the House know accordingly.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the matter will be drawn to the Prime Minister's attention.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that two days ago I raised a point of order because my name had been added in error to a number of early-day motions, including 1398 which is entitled "Massacre in Jerusalem". Some of my remarks at that time about the naivety or anti-semitic nature of the contents of the motion could have been taken as a personal remark about the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes), who shares my name. I should like to make it clear to the House that that was not my intention, nor is it my view. Naturally I withdraw my remarks so far as the hon. Gentleman is concerned.

Mr. Speaker: That is in the best traditions of the House, and I thank the hon. Member.

German Unification

[Relevant documents: Fourth Report from the Foreign Affairs Committee on German Unification: Some Immediate Issues (House of Commons Paper No. 335), the Observations by the Government on the Report (CM. 1246), and the Seventh Report from the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on International Monetary Arrangements: Eastern Europe (House of Commons Paper No. 431) and the Seventh Special Report from the Committee: the Government's Observations on the Seventh Report (House of Commons Paper No. 645) so far as they relate to German Economic and Monetary Union.]

9.39 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. COM(90) 400 on transitional measures consequent upon German unification and 8782/90 on revision of the Community's financial perspective in the light of German unification; and endorses the Government's approach to these negotiations.

The House will be aware that I have spent most of my parliamentary life in the genteel and rather sheltered world of the usual channels. To that extent, in relation to the House, I claim to be an innocent abroad. The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) kindly arranged a little outing on the nursery slopes for me by placing an Adjournment debate on the Order Paper just before the recess—a typically thoughtful gesture on his part—so I cannot even claim the House's indulgence as a novice performer at the Dispatch Box.

Today's main business is to debate the European Community's package of legislative proposals integrating the former German Democratic Republic into the European Community. That matter cannot be divorced from the wider background of the enormous changes that have swept across Europe in the past year. Nothing has symbolised those changes more than completion of the "Treaty on the Final Settlement with respect to Germany" and the achievement of German unification.

The unification of Germany is without doubt one of the single most important events to take place in our lifetime. It is a triumph for the German people and a vindication of the steadfastness of the allies throughout the cold war. And it is a tribute to President Gorbachev and his new Soviet Union.

German unification has heralded in an exciting prospect of a different and more hopeful world—a world not without danger and difficulty, but a world where it is possible for the community of nations—faced with the challenge of Saddam Hussein—to unite in a way that would have been unimaginable a year ago.

On a more prosaic level may I make a general House of Commons point? Those great events were triggered a year ago by the collapse of the Berlin wall; they gathered pace and moved on at a speed that is a salutary reminder to us politicians that, quite frequently, it is not we who shape events—but people themselves. The most that we can claim to do sometimes is to run along behind, trying to place these events in some kind of order. In essence, that is what we are doing in the House today.

The treaty, unification, and the EC reaction to it all took place while the House was in recess. I place on record my thanks for the co-operative response I received from the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), who leads for the Opposition on EC matters, and from the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) who chairs the Scrutiny Committee, when I expressed to them my anxiety that the House was not able to discuss these matters as and when they arose.

Equally my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell)—whose Select Committee report is one of the documents relevant to today's debate—has taken great pains to keep in close touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State throughout this fast moving drama. The Secretary of State has twice given evidence on German unification to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Government's reply to the Committee's report was published on 10 October.

I am grateful to all three Members for the interest they took in those matters during the recess, and I hope that the House itself will recognise that Her Majesty's Government have taken the earliest possible opportunity to enable the House to address itself to those matters.

In my speech, I shall remind the House briefly of the process of German unification, including two-plus-four talks and related matters. I shall then examine the EC implications of German unification, focusing in particular on the Commission's proposals for integrating the former GDR into the Community. In doing so, I shall draw attention to two detailed points that I expect to be of interest to the House: the interim arrangements now in force and the financial consequences of the overall package.

Let me turn first to the remarkable events of the past year in Germany. The process of unification began at the moment the Berlin wall was breached. From then on, the pressure for unification grew ever more intense as the bankruptcy of the GDR's economic and political system became clearer. Once the people of the GDR had voted on 18 March for unification, democracy and a market economy, work began in earnest. A decisive step was the introduction of German economic and monetary union —GEMU—on 1 July. I draw the attention of hon. Members to the report on this by the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service and the Government's reply. GEMU initiated a period of economic and social adjustment which will no doubt take some time to be resolved. The economic and social upheaval in turn gave rise to political pressures which led to the decision to unify on 3 October. Therefore, I shall deal first with the non-EC aspects.

At Ottawa in February my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues agreed on the framework of the so-called two-plus-four talks, which brought together the two German states and the four wartime allies—Britain, France, the United States and the USSR—to discuss the external aspects of German unification. That proved to be a successful piece of machinery. Throughout the two-plus-four process the Government took the view that unification itself was something for the Germans themselves to decide. But we were concerned to ensure that the external aspects, which considerably affected our interests and which included a number of rights and responsibilities, were properly addressed and dealt with.

Two-plus-four Ministers met four times: in Bonn on 5 May, in East Berlin on 22 June, in Paris on 17 July and in Moscow on 12 September. The Polish Foreign Minister took part in the Paris meeting when Germany's border with Poland was discussed.

The outcome of those meetings was the treaty to which I referred earlier. The treaty ends four-power rights and responsibilities relating to Germany as a whole and to Berlin, makes Germany's borders definitive, spells out that Soviet troops will leave Germany by the end of 1994, reaffirms Germany's right to belong to whatever alliances it chooses and deals with security arrangements for the territory of the former GDR. It is a good treaty, which meets our objectives while taking account of legitimate Soviet concerns.

The treaty comes into force when all signatories have ratified it. Germany and the United States have already done so. Our own ratification will be complete soon. It has been laid before the House in the normal way, for clearance under the Ponsonby rules. To cover the period between unification and entry into force of the treaty Foreign Ministers of the two-plus-four countries agreed in New York on 1 October that four-power rights and responsibilities would be suspended from the date of unification, 3 October, so that Germany would enjoy full sovereignty from the outset.

Two-plus-four was limited to those areas of business that the four powers and Germany needed to resolve together. We have also been active in negotiations with the Germans, the French and the Americans over issues that concern the western allies. The outcome of those is a series of agreements dealing with: the stationing of forces in Germany, the stationing of forces in Berlin, the 1952-54 relations and settlement conventions, and air services to Berlin. The purpose of those agreements is to put in place the practical arrangements needed to replace those that fell away with the ending of four-power rights and responsibilities. They will all be published as Command Papers.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): My hon. Friend the Minister mentioned a document on air services. Will he say now or during the winding-up speech whether the ridiculous height limitation on flights into Berlin have been abolished?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall ask my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who is to wind up the debate, to answer the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg).

The background that I have outlined is, of course, directly relevant to the central purpose of our debate—the EC implications of German unification. The two-plus-four negotiations did not address the integration of the former GDR into the European Community. That is a matter for all EC member states. The United Kingdom has, from the outset, worked for the smooth and rapid integration of the GDR into the European Community. At the Dublin European Council in April, the Prime Minister was instrumental in securing conclusions that set the Community machine in motion. The European Council tasked the Commission to prepare proposals paving the way for EC-GDR integration. The Commission produced a detailed and thorough set of proposals in August. They landed on my desk, all 322 pages of them, at a time when many right hon. and hon. Members had other seasonal distractions. Those proposals are the focus of today's debate.

The leitmotif—hon. Members will forgive Watford a little Wagner today—of the Commission's approach was to ensure that, in principle, the territories of the former GDR became part of the European Community upon unification. That meant EC law had to be applied there as from 3 October.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I hope that the hon. Gentleman or the Minister who is to reply to the debate will say something about the implications of unification for some of those whom I represent—the fishermen in Scotland. I have not met a single person in Scotland who has not wholeheartedly welcomed unification, but our fishing communities are deeply concerned about the implications of an enlarged German fishing fleet being allowed to fish in the so-called free waters west of Scotland and in the North sea.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Gentleman raised that question with my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the House when he made his business statement on Monday. I know that the hon. Gentleman will be relieved to hear that the reply that my hon. Friend the Minister will make at the end of the debate will satisfy both the hon. Gentleman and those whom he represents.

It was not possible for EC law to apply in its entirety in the former GDR immediately; environmental and other standards were well below the Community norm. A transitional period was clearly required before such standards could be applied. A limited number of derogations were necessary. The Commission's package therefore contains a series of substantive proposals for legislation. Each of them has been described for the House in an explanatory memorandum deposited with the Scrutiny Committee during the recess.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): How much will they cost?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall deal with that later in my remarks.

The main areas covered are trade, agriculture, environment and transport. When the Commission prepared its package, it was assumed that German unification would take place towards the end of the year. The telescoping of the timetable for German unification meant that European Community institutions could not complete their handling of the package before 3 October. It was therefore necessary to adopt interim procedural arrangements that would cater for the period between unification on 3 October and final adoption by the Council of the Commission's proposals. We expect that to happen in late November or early December.

We had a unique problem during that interregnum. No one wanted the ex-GDR integrated into the Community but unable to apply the acquis in full and with no constraint on the extent of its non-compliance. The Commission package therefore also contained two draft Council instruments that authorised the Commission to apply the proposed measures during the interim period as if they had already been adopted. That was of course without prejudice to the final Council decisions on the individual legislative proposals.

I submitted explanatory memorandums on those measures to the House on 10 September. I discussed them with the Chairman of the Scrutiny Committee on 7 September, and wrote to him on that date. It is fair to say that he, too, recognised the need for an interim arrangement, and the impossibility of holding up a decision until after the House reassembled some two weeks after unification. The Foreign Affairs Council discussed the draft instruments on 12 September, and finally adopted them on 17 September.

I regret that, because of the recess, it was not possible to meet normal scrutiny arrangements for those measures. Our purpose was to set a limit to the extent of derogations permissible during the interregnum. An absence of specific legislation would have risked a free-for-all which would have been in no one's interest. The procedure also allows the Commission to act, during the interim phase, as if its proposals were in force. Negotiations so far have shown that there are no major problems for Britain in the Commission's proposals. I hope that the House will agree that under the circumstances the Government were right to take a decision on those measures during the recess.

I now come to the main package of transitional measures. European Community—GDR integration poses a number of detailed technical issues across a range of EC policies, of interest to several Whitehall Departments. The Commission's proposals are the subject of intense negotiations in Brussels. A special working group has been dealing with the package in uninterrupted session. There will be a brief discussion of the package at the Foreign Affairs Council next Monday and probably also at the Council in November. Now is, therefore, an ideal opportunity for the House to express its views on the substance.

The task of integrating the GDR into the European Community throws up no institutional problems. The German Government have not sought amendments to the treaties establishing the Community—only to secondary legislation. Nor have the German Government sought amendments to the provisions for German weighting in qualified majority voting or an increase in the number of German members of the European Parliament to reflect German unification. I am sure that the whole House will welcome that.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Does not the German lack of interest in extending its representation in the European Parliament show the weakness of the European Parliament? It is like joining nothing, so there will not be any great pressure to take additional seats. Additional seats will be required only if the European Parliament begins to be of significance—the more significant it is, the more pressure there will be from the Germans to take additional seats.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments. I suppose that he is a crypto-member of the Labour party in these matters. His view on the Community and on the European Parliament is not, as I now understand it, the view taken by the Labour Front Bench. I do not think that it is even remotely plausible to accuse the Federal Republic of Germany of a lack of interest either in the European Parliament or in the Community.

Mr. Skinner: The truth is that the Minister is a crypto-Euro fanatic and always has been. When he entered this place, his main intention was to become further embroiled in the Common Market, but I do not think that he told the electors of Watford about his intention. Now he has an opportunity to prove it. He is saying something quite appalling to the House today. Germany has a £36 billion surplus on its trade with the rest of the world, and we are up to the neck in debt, yet the Minister is proposing that British taxpayers, who are already saddled with £16 per family to prop up the common agricultural policy, should hand out more of their money so that Germany can be even more powerful than it already is. I think that the Minister is a crypto-jackboot.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It is an important moment in the life of any Front-Bench spokesman when he receives his first intervention from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). It was a characteristically cosmopolitan intervention. If I am a crypto-Euro fanatic, he is a crypto-member of the Labour party in these matters.

Mr. Harry Barnes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not intend to raise a point of order about being called a crypto-member of the Labour party—nor, I imagine, will my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Mr. Garel-Jones: The House may find it helpful if I highlight the major substantive issues under negotiation in Brussels. One area of discussion in Brussels so far has been trade. It is extremely encouraging that the Commission estimates that about 80 per cent. of single market legislation can apply to the ex-GDR immediately, including that on public procurement, financial services, company law, indirect taxation and intellectual property.

The Community does, however, have to take some account of the very different trading environment within which the GDR has been operating until only very recently. It would, for example, cause considerable difficulties for the East Germans if goods produced in the former GDR were suddenly banned from sale in their own markets on the ground that they did not comply with EC standards. The Commission has, therefore, proposed that such goods may continue to be sold in the territory of the former GDR for a limited period. That does not, of course, affect other EC goods, which may circulate freely in the former GDR.

While many trade agreements between the former GDR and her traditional trading partners in eastern Europe, including the Soviet Union, expire at the end of this year, others will need to be renegotiated. The normal application of the EC rules would mean the immediate imposition of EC tariffs and standards on imports into the former GDR. Not only would that cause difficulties for GDR businesses, but it might also cause economic problems for the third countries involved that we and others are trying to assist. The Commission has, therefore, proposed that the derogations allowed for sub-standard GDR goods may also be extended to traditional eastern European imports, and that tariffs on east European imports may be suspended up to the maximum quantities and value of traditional patterns of trade.

We support those proposals. They should not cause any distortion to UK trade, because the transitional periods are so short—only limited derogations are allowed beyond 1992—and the goods benefiting from these derogations will only be traded within the territory of the former GDR.

We must of course ensure that the goods benefiting from those transitional arrangements do not circulate elsewhere in the Community, which would risk distorting trade. We have had particularly close contact with the German Government on that point, and, I am pleased to say, have reached a satisfactory agreement. We are confident that the risk of leakage is small—but were any problem to arise, arrangements have been put in place to ensure very rapid action to end it.

I have already mentioned briefly the length of the derogations. The Commission's aim, in line with the conclusions of Dublin Council in April—reported to the House by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister immediately afterwards—is to keep the number of transitional derogations from EC law as few, and as short, as possible. Quite rightly so. In practice, most derogations are for two years—until the end of December 1992. In some areas, however—notably the environment—longer derogations are unavoidable. Rt. hon. and hon. Members will need no reminding of the appalling state of environmental decline in the GDR—as good a symbol as one could hope to find of the failure of the communist system.

With derogations proposed until the end of 1995 at the latest, GDR industry will need to make considerable and rapid efforts to meet EC requirements, and the Commission also wisely ensured that new infrastructural investment in the GDR will be excluded from these derogations. So from now on, for example, any new power stations there will have to be built to EC standards. Again, we are satisfied that there is little risk of distortions to competition, but any difficulties could be taken up with the Commission.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Does the Minister have any calculations about the cost of cleaning up East Germany? I have heard a figure mentioned, for a 10-year period, of $140 billion to $150 billion.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The cost, which will be substantial, will fall on the Federal Republic. I do not know what the exact figure will be, but that is the price that the former citizens of the GDR must pay for 40 years of the kind of rule that some Opposition Members below the Gangway would support for our own country.

Competition policy and state aids are, of course, of particular interest and concern to us. One great advantage of bringing forward the date of unification is that the full force of the EC treaty in those areas will now apply to the former GDR. That is important at a crucial time in the economic development of the territory, with massive new investment flowing in. We have now moved to a position where the competition policy Commissioner, Sir Leon Brittan, has direct responsibility for applying the treaty of Rome in a country which a year ago was a communist state.

The Commission package includes proposals to allow derogations from secondary legislation on state aids, by allowing assistance to the shipbuilding and steel sectors. But we are satisfied that the current provisions of the sixth shipbuilding directive, which will apply to the ex-GDR and will be extended to the seventh Directive, protect the interest of other member states, and we have successfully pressed for assurances from the Commission that they will closely supervise the provision of aids to the steel sector, and take urgent action should any distortions of competition arise.

Agriculture is of course a key area, too, and one with immediate financial implications for the Community. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, will speak later in the debate, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and will cover those matters in some detail.

The United Kingdom has worked hard in the Brussels negotiations to resolve issues of potential concern. I am glad to be able to report that virtually all the areas of concern to us have been worked out to our satisfaction. Subject to approval by the House today, I hope that the Council will be able to reach a common position on the Commission's package before the end of the month. Final adoption should be by early December at the latest, following the Second Reading in the European Parliament.

That decision will, in effect, complete the handling of the external aspects of German unification. The rapid pace at which the package will have been handled in Brussels and Strasbourg is a tribute to the effectiveness of all the Community institutions.

I turn to the financial implications, in which the hon. Member for Bolsover expressed an interest. Volume III of the main commission package, which I am sure the hon. Member for Bolsover has read, covers that aspect, and the financial implications are updated by the Commission's proposal for revision of financial perspective, which also forms part of this debate. It is, of course, for the German Government to cope with the costs of unification. It has always been clear that they would bear the lion's share of the cost of adjustment.

There will, however, also be both expenditure and revenue on the EC budget as a result of integrating the GDR into the Community. As I have already made clear, EC law applies to the former GDR from unification. That includes the own resources decision. There will, therefore, be an immediate new source of income to the Community as a result of integration. However, the former GDR territories will also be eligible for Community expenditure —for example, from the structural funds and on agriculture.

Overall, the budgetary costs of EC-GDR integration should be well within the revenue ceiling set out in the 1988 own resources decision. Precise estimates are difficult, but the Commission estimates a net cost to the Community of about 500 mecu in 1991, peaking at a maximum of 1 becu —about £700 million—in 1992.

Our latest estimate is of a net cost to the Community of some 650 mecu in 1991, peaking at a maximum of some 1·2 becu—around £835 million—in 1992.

Thanks to the Fontainebleau mechanism—I know that the hon. Member for Bolsover is closely attached to that because it has involved substantial savings for Britain over the years, thanks to the intervention of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, savings which the Labour Government were prepared to forgo—the net cost to the United Kingdom of EC-GDR integration will be small —on these figures, nil in 1990 and about £32 million in respect of 1991. I should stress that these figures can only be indicative at this stage.

Mr. Skinner: We have heard all this before about the Prime Minister going to the Common Market and coming back with barrowloads of money. The truth is that since the Government got in in 1979, it has cost the British taxpayer £14 billion to be a member of the Common Market, so where are the barrowloads of money? The Minister now says that the cost will be nil this year and about £32 million next year. The truth is that those figures are fiddled like all the other Government figures.. Here we are with the British taxpayer paying £16 a week for every family in Britain to prop up the common agricultural policy. We are now giving money to make the German regime more powerful. The Minister also said that the Government are going to prop up shipbuilding yards in east Germany and elsewhere—while they are shutting down shipbuilding yards in Sunderland and Birkenhead. What a scandal.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The truth is that the cost to the United Kingdom is considerably less than the British taxpayer has been spending for the past 20 years on propping up the industry that the hon. Gentleman is so interested in. If the Commission needed any advice on cooking the books, I think that it would know where to go.

This small cost to the United Kingdom will, we hope, be offset by greater opportunities for United Kingdom firms to do business in the German Democratic Republic. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is encouraging United Kingdom businesses to explore for themselves the important opportunities created by German unification. There are now 16 million new consumers in the single market. It is vital that we do not leave these new investment opportunities for others. The former German Democratic Republic territories must certainly come to terms with massive economic problems as a result of the transformation of their economies, but we believe that rapid growth is likely in due course.

At the outset of the debate I referred to the historic importance of these events that the House is now debating. As the Foreign Affairs Committee report points out,

"the re-emergence of a great unified German state is a development which alters the structure of world power".

A year ago East Germany was a communist country with all that that meant politically, economically and in terms of human rights. Today, with the documents before the House, we have in our hands the tools which bind that ex-communist territory into our democratic system, into our single market.

The new united democratic Germany makes the Community stronger and larger than it was before the recess. Yes, it is a challenge, too, because Germany will carry—and deserves to carry—a lot of weight within the Community institutions. But those challenges will be met on the level playing field increasingly provided by the single market. We in Britain must meet them because it is the challenge of the market place for which we have fought for so long within the Community.

But there is another challenge that all nations now face, and that is the wider challenge of the new world order, in which the new Germany will play an important role. As we have seen in the Gulf, it is an order which is not without danger and risk, but the very response the world has made to the situation there underlines the hopes that we all have for the future.

I have no doubt that the House will want to play its part in pressing forward with the process of EC-GDR integration which is a small part of the wider process of European integration after the collapse of communist ideology. I commend the proposals to the House.

10.14 am

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I offer a warm welcome to the Dispatch Box to the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones). He comes with a remarkable reputation, forged in the smoke-filled heat of the Whips' Office, and the delight of his right-wing friends at his movement to the Foreign Office—perhaps he will be replaced by some of them—tells its own tale of his background.

I offer the Minister a salutary warning—he should not get to like his job, because it is not an especially safe post. Since I was appointed to the Opposition Front Bench to speak on foreign affairs, nine years ago this month, I have watched no fewer than 23 Foreign Office Ministers come and go. The last tranche of three lasted one day less than a year. The hon. Gentleman's predecessor, the hon. Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude), the Minister for Europe, was one of those who managed one day less than a year. In the light of certain events last night in the south of England, it is likely that the hon. Member for Watford will be back in the Opposition Whips' Office before that record can be broken.

I welcome the debate because the subject is of enormous and momentous importance, but I must enter one caveat. I note the congratulations and thanks that the hon. Member for Watford gave for the co-operation he had received. The Scrutiny Committee, to whose work he paid testimony, does an enormously valuable job and has produced two reports on the documents that we are considering. I became aware of those reports as I sat listening to the Minister's speech. The reports are extremely important and apparently they were in the Vote Office at some point during the week—perhaps late on Wednesday—though they are not on the Table of the House for hon. Members this morning. I know that this is not directly the Minister's responsibility, but when the House is asked to consider documents running to more than 320 pages at very short notice and when the Scrutiny Committee goes to the time and trouble of going through them, making recommendations and drawing conclusions, the House should at least be made aware that its report is available in the Vote Office. The attention of Front-Bench spokesmen, as well as those responsible for the issue, should be drawn to that fact. It is a matter of some regret to me that that did not happen and I point it out for the future.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I am grateful that my hon. Friend has drawn our attention to reports, which hon. Members on the Scrutiny Committee feel are important. For the record, the Committee considered these documents after receiving them in the post during the recess. I pay tribute to the Minister for his excellent communications to Committee members during the recess. The Committee met on Tuesday morning at 10.30 and we hoped that our report would be made available. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for advertising the importance of our reports. Ultimately they will be published as our 32nd report of the Session. When debates arise at short notice we put the typescript of our reports in the Vote Office and we hope that these reports are a succinct summary of the content and import of many important documents.

Mr. Robertson: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend and to the work that his Committee has done by glancing through these documents. In the limited time available I have found that the report offers a helpful and useful gloss on the matter that we are considering. The authorities of the House should consider how Scrutiny Committee reports can be made more generally available to hon. Members.

Although it is the European Community implications of German reunification that we are considering today, that act of uniting the two German states, brutally and artificially divided for the last 40 years, marks the final end of the second world war and puts a line under the cold war itself. Those of us, such as the Minister and myself, who have known only the days of a divided Europe, and a continent divided on that fault line which ran through Germany from the Baltic sea to the borders of Czechoslovakia, can especially savour the final act of a chilling and paralysing play which went on for so long.

I still retain memories of seeing the Berlin wall for the first time. Few people, in my experience, found it easy to take in. It seemed, at exactly the same time, to be both obscene and absurd, with concrete, guns, guards, dogs, traffic traps and searchlights all the way down the centre of a city in the modern world. It struck me then, and it still does, as incredible and sinister. I cannot imagine such an absurdity surviving the derisive vandalism of a couple of days of Glaswegian hostility. It survived, however, for far too long. Its asbestos-riddled chill will have entered the soul of a generation of Germans and others. It will not, and never should be, forgotten. The wall has now gone, but it is not yet a full year since that emotional 9 November when the pack of rotten cards that was the edifice of the German Democratic Republic finally crumbled.

Today is a day for marking in this Parliament our joy at the end of a divided Germany, a day when this Parliament of our United Kingdom can pay tribute to those brave people in the former German Democratic Republic who stood for freedom, decency and self-respect against a corrupt, corrosive communist dictatorship and whose real sacrifices laid the foundation for people to be free for the first time in almost 60 years.

We can, and we should, also pay tribute to the robustness of West Germany's democratic institutions. Some of them were certainly influenced and built by us after the second world war, but all of them were made to work by Germans who were determined not to repeat the horrors perpetrated by former generations. The success, both economic and political, of the Federal Republic of Germany is a testimony to the achievement of the post-war German generations in building a new nation which is peaceful, prosperous, generous and friendly, and that may be a moral for the new world order to which we all aspire.

We should also pay tribute in the debate to some others who transformed science fiction into political science during the last 12 momentous months—to the Hungarians, whose decision to open their borders to the refugees from Herr Honecker's "workers' paradise" kicked the final crutch from under the regime; to the Poles, whose devotion to Solidarity, even after martial law was imposed, kick-started the whole process that led to the end of the walls, the wires and the communist ruling classes; and to Mikhail Gorbachev, justifiably the recipient this week of the Nobel peace prize. who gave the signal that force would no longer be the means of tying the satellite states to mother Russia and who now sees mother Russia herself disintegrating into a dozen potential Lebanons.

Although the debate gives us a chance to recognise and debate the new era that German unification, more than any other single event, symbolises, I recognise that it is also about the pain that the transition will involve. The 320 pages of the document before the House are a blow-by-blow description of the complexities and problems that this one act of political progress will mean for our 12-nation Community.

The Opposition endorse the general position that the Government have taken, reflecting, as it does, the collective position of the Council of Ministers, the Commission and the European Parliament. The pace of unification took everyone, including many Germans, by surprise. The measures that have been outlined are clearly necessary in the special circumstances, even though we all realise that more time, were it available, would make the transition easier and more digestible.

Before I deal with the Commission's document, I wish to refer to the important implications that the unification of Germany will have for our bilateral relations with Germany. Germany was and, in its larger form, will continue to be Britain's major European partner. The united Germany's eventual economic and political strength will make that relationship more and more important, so how we build our friendship and partnership with Germany will very largely determine what sort of role we ourselves play in the new Europe. That should be a self-evident and blindingly obvious truth. That it has to be said at all is a measure of just how hopelessly the Government of this country, and especially its Prime Minister, have managed their dealings with Germany in the past year.

The Prime Minister started with hostility to the very idea of unification; then she obstructed it; then she regretted it, even when it was inevitable; then she harked back to former German sins to disparage it. When, at last, she accepted the inevitable and was forced into grudging acceptance of it, her lack of warmth for it and her absence of pleasure at its symbolism blighted and injured the crucial relationship between our two countries. The disaster that was the Ridley fiasco simply put the icing on an already-poisoned cake. After his humiliating and disgraced resignation the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley) still boasted in the Sunday Express in August:

"I believe that what I have said to you is not very far away at all from the position of the British Government."

That came from a man who was sitting in the British Cabinet in July. When, as he said, he was "still at the top of the political tree"

he was asked by Dominic Lawson:

"But surely Herr Kohl is preferable to Herr Hitler? He's not going to bomb us after all."

The right hon. Gentleman could not, however, reply with the word no. Instead he said:

"I'm not sure I wouldn't rather have the shelters and the chance to fight back, than simply being taken over by economics."

As the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) said, revealingly, in The Guardian shortly afterwards, the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry had "momentarily possessed a gift in communication that eludes most front benchers."

Some gift; some Front Bench.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): After those remarks and the subsequent resignation of a certain person, did the hon. Gentleman regard it as a little bizarre that although a small number of people in this country said, slightly behind their hands, "Of course that person was correct; the Germans are bombastic and arrogant and wish to seize the whole of Europe and tell the rest of us what to do", the same people, several weeks later, in respect of the Gulf crisis said, "Why aren't the Germans with us in the Gulf with their forces? Why are they so pathetic and timid?" Was not it a strange double act by the same set of people?

Mr. Robertson: I could not have put it better myself. There are double standards. The hon. Gentleman points the finger unerringly in the direction that has probably kept him below the Gangway for much longer than he deserves.

At a time when bilateral relations really matter, if Britain's view and our special circumstances are to prevail at the European Community's intergovernmental conference in December, the Prime Minister's insensitivity and hooligan diplomacy have made us, first, a laughing stock and, secondly, a sadly ignored passenger in Europe. She may say, as she said in February:

"We dared to say the realities and talk the sense which other people are fearful to say, lest they be misinterpreted."

However, what grates with those who may even share her gut apprehensions is the crudely counter-productive effect of her ill-chosen words and her careless talk.

I ask the House to consider the Prime Minister's boastful approach last November at the Lord Mayor's banquet when she said:

"We re-established respect for Britain abroad and more and more we found the ideas that we had rediscovered were spreading to other countries as they began to free up their economies and return to the values which across the years had made Europe one of the greatest civilisations of the world."

Contrast that with the words of Chancellor Kohl in October, who said:

"At the beginning of the last decade of this century we see new opportunities for a world which solves its problems through reconciliation and understanding, and remains committed to the principles of international law. Our country stands shoulder to shoulder with all of those who are committed to peace, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms as well as individual well being."

That contrast of tone and content shows the true measure of those who constantly hark back to the sins of the past and those, including the majority of people in this country, who look forward to the opportunities and promises of the future. Let the Prime Minister reflect on how worried this world would be, and with some justification, if Germany were adopting her brand of know-all nationalism.

I should like to touch on one particular aspect of the unification process concerning the lessons that some secessionist elements in Scotland take from the entry of east Germany into the community. The Scottish National party is trying to make out that the accession of the eastern Länder of Germany to the European Community proves its bogus prospectus on automatic membership of the Community for a separate Scotland. As usual, it deliberately misses the point. First, the constitution of the federal republic always allowed for the accession of East Germany, individually or collectively, to that state. Secondly, rapid unification was a economic imperative for the two Germanys, where, in effect, the German Democratic Republic was collapsing into the federal republic. Thirdly, and crucially, the European Commission has made it clear in the document before us that "It views the integration of the GDR into a united Germany, and hence into the Community, as a special case. It will have to be done by stages. However, it does not necessarily require any amendments to the Treaties."

The secession of a part of the United Kingdom and its application to join the European Community would also be a special case, but, in contrast, would necessitate a major treaty change. That would require messy negotiations with vetoes possible, indeed almost inevitable, from other countries naturally worried by similar secessionist aspirations. Once again, the Scottish National party seeks to twist the events alive in Europe today to camouflage a policy which sounds attractive, but which if embarked on would threaten Scotland with chilly isolation from the European family.

This amazing report is right to warn us of the sizeable consequences for the European economy of German unification. Those consequences will reach well beyond the borders of the new Federal Republic, and will, as hon. Members will show later in the debate, penetrate into many aspects of British life—for example, into agriculture, shipbuilding, the environment and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) will show if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the fishing industry.

I had the pleasure of attending the debate in the European Parliament in Strasbourg last month when its committee on unification was considering this issue. It was a spirited and informed debate, watched with vigilance and interest from beside me by the Soviet ambassador to the European Community as well as by members of the now disbanded Volkskammer of the German Democratic Republic. I pay tribute to the European Parliament for its thorough work on the subject, especially to my friend and colleague Alan Donnelly, the Member of the European Parliament for Tyne and Wear, who was a most able rapporteur to the committee. He carried out an onerous and prestigious task to plaudits from all sides of that assembly and most countries involved.

A German newspaper reporting the debate concluded with this sentiment:

"There was only one thing lacking, the European Members of parliament in Strasbourg had only a vague idea of the real situation in the GDR."

That was not a fair or accurate reservation. The MEPs appreciate, as the German people are slowly realising, the enormity of the problems being exposed in the former German Democratic Republic. It is an environmental nightmare, an economic basket case, an investment Eiger wall and a social disaster zone——

Mr. Garel-Jones: Socialism.

Mr. Robertson: —caused by 40 years of communism; it has nothing whatsoever to do with socialism.

All those problems appear in the 320 pages of the report and much of it was predicted in the excellent report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs earlier this year and in the report on the monetary aspects from the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman's extremely generous praise of Chancellor Kohl and his recent remark that the former Democratic Republic's problems had nothing whatever to do with socialism. Do not the recent results of the German elections reveal that the Germans are not as positive about that as he is?

Mr. Robertson: The real test of German opinion will be on 2 December. It remains to be seen how strong the Conservative elements will be in that country, but it does not come well from a member of a party that is 13 per cent. behind in the opinion polls in this country and which stunningly lost a safe Conservative seat last night to tell us about the success of the Labour party or of the German Social Democratic party.

The Conservative party is slipping into an era of desperation. When the Prime Minister clambers to the Dispatch Box to call the Leader of the Opposition "a crypto-communist" and a party political broadcast parades various eastern European luminaries across the screen to try to prop up the collapsing edifice of Thatcherism, people in this country will not be confused and will not be conned by the cheap propaganda or by the uncalculated desperation of the Prime Minister when she makes such accusations.

As the Minister amply displayed in his speech, we do not know the full facts. Years of statistical intervention and corruption in the GDR have left behind a wholly distorted picture. In their response to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Government say that unemployment in the former GDR in August was 1·75 million people, or 20 per cent. of the work force. On 4 October, the German federal labour office in Bonn put joblessness in the German Democratic Republic at 440,000, or 5 per cent. of the labour force. There is, therefore, a contradiction in the statistics that are being produced.

Even the costs of unification to the German taxpayer are obscured and perhaps will become public knowledge only after the all-German elections on 2 December. The Government's response to the Select Committee puts the cost at DM 100 billion per year, but on 4 October Chancellor Kohl put the overall cost at "a four figure billion sum".

It would appear that these costs alone will eliminate the total external surplus of the Federal Republic of Germany —a matter which exercises my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)—which is a major prop to the trade deficit in the United States of America. The knock-on effects of German unification will go well beyond the borders of that country.

There will be worrying costs to the European Community, as the lengthy financial memorandum outlines. Although the Minister expresses confidence, there is no real assurance that it is justified. The costs are calculated at DM 4 billion per year, with a net addition to the Community budget from Germany of DM 3 billion. We are told that the other DM 1 billion can be found without cost to the present budget, but there will inevitably be an increasing long-term budget for the European Community as a result of unification, which must be worrying to the German Government and other Governments.

Germany is again one state and the symbolic importance of that to the German people should not be underestimated. In the short term, that state—saddled by the legacy of the past 40 wasted years in the east—will have problems aplenty and it will need our support, help and guidance to get through that period. Thereafter, we had better be in no doubt that the new Germany will be a formidable power—economically, politically, but certainly not militarily—in our continent. However, inside the embrace of the European Community and sharing and participating in the pooled sovereignty that the Community represents, it will and must be a power for good. It will, though, pose one threat to this country and to our economy, enfeebled by these past 11 years, and that is a threat that we and we alone can meet and counter if we want to do so. It is up to us, the fortunate generation which is alive and in public life as the continent unites again, to see that our people get the means to join equally in that formidable competition.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): The recent report on German unification by the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, to which my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) referred, began with these words:

"The re-emergence of a great unified German state is a development which alters the structure of world power. For Europe it is the most profound event since the division of the continent at the onset of the Cold War. Taken together, the decline of the Soviet 'empire' and dominance in Eastern Europe and the related coming together of the two German States are creating a new political map of Europe. The United Kingdom, as a prominent nation in Europe, as well as being one of the four occupying powers of post-war Germany, is fundamentally affected by these momentous and rapid changes."

Whether one looks on the reunification process with enthusiasm, as many do, or with mixed feelings, as many others do, the fact is that it became inevitable. The second the wall came down—perhaps some in the Federal Republic and elsewhere should have seen this more quickly than they did—it became inevitable that there would be a high-speed movement not merely towards monetary and economic unification but towards full political unification. With the perspective of last spring, we pointed out in our Select Committee report that, however fast the process already seemed then, it would be faster still and would become a top-speed operation. That has proved to be the case. The process has moved so quickly that, in a sense, it has gone ahead of the capacity of the European Community institutions and its members to make the necessary changes in time to admit the GDR to the Community. That is why we have this interregnum, about which my hon. Friend the Minister talked.

The reason for the speed lay in the fact that the disparities between the Federal Republic and East Germany were so vast that there was a possibility that, the moment the wall was down, millions of people would move across from East Germany to the west, unless there was a positive reassurance that East Germany would be quickly embraced in the West German economic system and in the values and support of the European Community. Even so, there was a colossal migratory movement and many thousands began to cross. That would have become an uncontrollable flood, utterly destabilising West Germany, unless there had been rapid acceleration of the timetable.

Unification has taken place. It is now our task in the House and in this country, as it is in other legislatures throughout the world, to meet the considerable challenges with immense vigour and to understand and respond to them. In our report, we put those challenges into a number of groups. We said that, first, there were the problems of welcoming a vastly enlarged Germany—much the largest member—into the European Community, and of recognising the inevitable changes that would be imposed on West Germany and East Germany and on the Community's procedures and structures by the arrival of that large new member state. Secondly, we discussed external aspects—the effect of a united Germany on broader questions of security in Europe and in the post-cold war security order.

On the first group of problems, we began in our Select Committee report to look at the issues which we are specifically considering today and which are raised by the proposals and documents before us—the cost to the European Community and individual members. There seems to be a little confusion as to whether a cost arises in 1990. It is clear from every document that a cost will arise in 1991 and 1992 for the whole Community and the United Kingdom. The documents state that the estimated cost to the United Kingdom could be about £50 million in 1991 and perhaps more in 1992.

The Scrutiny Committee, which does a superb job in keeping an eagle eye on these matters, reports in one of its papers the Commission's view that there will be no immediate cost impact in 1990, whereas the Foreign Office memorandum and explanatory note says that there will be an immediate cost. It is important for Ministers to clarify whether there is an immediate cost to the Community or United Kingdom budget. As hon. Members will recognise, there seems to be a flat contradiction between the Commission's view and statements by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Has the Commission just got it wrong? That seems probable.

The costs to the Federal Republic are enormous. I thank my hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues for the unusually full reply by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Government to the Select Committee's report. That useful reply went into interesting detail and recorded the staggering fact that the West Germans, who were expecting to pay about DM40 billion in 1990 out of their budget for the extra costs of unification, now face the prospect of paying DM100 billion—an overshoot of 150 per cent. in the current year. That is a staggering extra burden, even if it falls on one of the world's most powerful and richest economies, and it is bound to create enormous tensions not merely in that economy but in terms of funds being less available from Germany, one of the great capital engines of the 1980s.

Those funds will increasingly be diverted to East Germany and to internal matters, and the rest of the world will have to go without them. That will inevitably put new challenges in front of those who manage the deutschmark. It might not have worried us quite so much before we were in a fixed or semi-floating relationship to the deutschmark, but we are now within the ERM. It is important for us to be able to monitor closely the effect of the unification process on the deutschmark.

On the whole, I draw confidence from what the managers of the deutschmark in Frankfurt—the Bundesbank—are doing. They were overruled on many aspects of German monetary union and reunification. They argued, rightly, that the exchange rate was absurdly high and would inflict appalling and rapid damage on large swathes of East German industry. That has happened, but the bill has to be picked up in vastly increased welfare and unemployment benefits. That is where the extra DM60 billion has been generated.

Nevertheless, at the Bundesbank, people are clearly determined, despite the huge extra impost on the budget, to put one aim above all else—to maintain the integrity of the deutschmark. It is an interesting aside—and we shall come back to this in our debate next week—to ask why we are so confident that, despite all the extra strains, the deutschmark will maintain its soundness as a currency. The answer is that it has behind it a well-tested, immensely reliable and proven structure—the Bundesbank. It is an independent, central monetary authority, which puts the soundness of the German currency first. If it did not, it would create chaos for the rest of us.

If there is a lesson to be drawn for our own adventure into the exchange rate mechanism, it is that we shall not be able to operate effectively the disciplines in the ERM unless we, too, have a central monetary authority with the status and reputation in world currency markets that the Bundesbank has. That is a fundamental condition if we are to be part of the system as well. I have digressed slightly from our central concern about the effect on the deutschmark of the reunification process. As a result of the Bundesbank's commitment and the Germans' determination to put the soundness of their currency first, they will manage, although the strains will be great.

There are costs for eastern Europe, which we tend to overlook in the excitement of looking at the unification process. We must remember that Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary and Bulgaria are going through the same liberalising, free market cold shower. However, they have no rich uncle, no West Germany to pour in billions to cushion the enormous effect of moving into market economics. One of the repercussions of the rapid integration process—which, on the whole, I welcome—is that the new democracies, which are just struggling to get out from their old, planned framework and into a free market environment and which are just dipping the first toe into that ice-cold water, are being hit by the most appalling series of problems, one of which is the rapidity with which they have lost their East German markets.

In the Commission documents there is some provision to ensure that at least over the interregnum of a few weeks ahead, the absence of tariffs governing the exports from Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland into East Germany continues, but thereafter—and the Czechs take this view—those countries will have to say goodbye to many of their East German markets. That is happening at a moment when they are also saying goodbye to many of their markets in the Soviet Union, which is about to break up and disappear down a black hole. It comes at a time when their oil costs are soaring to the skies, although oil prices, I am glad to see, are at last beginning to return to sanity. It comes at a time when they are still not sure what access they will have to the rest of the European Community.

That change also comes at a time—and this is very much a matter for the United Kingdom—when there is a definite push to expand the use of the German language. The dominance of German business arrangements runs right through eastern Europe. We already have a true inner deutschmark zone, not only in the countries in the ERM, but in the countries that have said publicly that they will link their currencies absolutely at fixed rates to the deutschmark. Among those countries are Austria, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Luxembourg and, of course, the former German Democratic Republic. I know that the German authorities hope that, in due course, Czechoslovakia will join the deutschmark zone and that a convertible currency can somehow be achieved.

Our eyes would be tightly shut if we did not realise how the reunification process is changing all the balances and trade relationships in eastern Europe, and creating the most colossal challenges for the new democracies there. We must respond to that and, in my personal view, far more vigorously than we have so far, not least because the success or failure of the other bits of eastern Europe, apart from eastern Germany, will be our success or failure. We cannot merely watch and assume that everything will be taken care of by the invisible hand and by market forces now that communism has been destroyed. It will not necessarily happen that way unless there is vigorous and active western intervention and support on a scale higher than we have envisaged so far. If that does not happen, the opportunity for open and free economies to stretch from this side of Europe into Soviet Asia will be thrown over and history will judge us unkindly on that score.

When we studied these matters earlier in the year, we were worried that the Soviets might be a little difficult and that there would be arguments about the pace at which the Red Army of the west, encircling Berlin with its 350,000 soldiers and 200,000 dependants, would go and when it would go. To the great credit of all those involved in the two-plus-four process, of the Bonn Government and of those in Moscow, those problems have broadly been sorted out. They have been sorted out partly by the simple process of the Red Army of the west, like the East German army, beginning to disintegrate. Desertions have increased and it is becoming harder for the armies to be held together at all. The East German army has gone through an amazing process of self-shrinking as more and more of its members have simply failed to turn up for work. That is one way of carrying out the disarmament and weapons control process.

The Soviet army is also suffering huge desertions. That will become a major social problem, and will cost West Germany DM12 billion. It will have to spend money in keeping the troops round Berlin for a while, then shipping them home to Russia and then providing them with housing there. The housing will be built by German construction firms with German money. The problem of the armies has resolved itself by a melting process and the difficulties that might have arisen and the possibility of the Soviet army's presence being used as a bargaining counter by Mr. Gorbachev have gone away.

The reunification will change NATO. The two Germanies are fully in NATO, although on several conditions, such as a limit to the size of the Bundeswehr and how operations are carried out in what was formerly East German territory. There are also unspoken conditions in the minds of the Germans.

This is not the end of the process, but the beginning. We must ask ourselves to what extent Germany, like the other great defeated, but now super-economic power, Japan, will be a positive, active and willing member of the international security community. There is a danger, and there may have been a sign of this over the Gulf issue. The Germans failed to rally as quickly as some had hoped to an obvious threat to European and world interests. Some people felt that we might have been seeing a sign of another sort of Germany—not a militarist Germany, but an anti-militarist Germany, which would be inward looking and uninterested in playing its part in world affairs. I do not think that that is in the minds of the present leaders in Bonn, who have been sturdy and solid in their commitment, but it is silly to pretend that that is not a possibility and that we must not keep on our guard. There is a fear that the huge new Germany may become so preoccupied with itself that it may become increasingly reluctant to have nuclear weapons on its soil—a matter that has yet to be fully worked out—and that it may begin to drift not to the neutralism that we feared in the past —which meant anti-western neutralism—but to a passive non-commitment to world affairs that we could ill afford, bearing in mind the fact that it is such a huge country at the centre of European and world affairs. That is a word of warning only.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does not my right hon. Friend think that the German idea at which he hinted in his speech—that Germany sees its future in terms of economic rather than military growth—could be the seed of that theory?

Mr. Howell: My hon. Friend touches on a point that is understandable from the German point of view. The Germans have had two military adventures in this century and one in the 1870s, which appeared marvellous at the time but have all ended in the most miserable deprivation, and in total disaster and catastrophe for their society. Many of them are immunised and inoculated against engaging in any kind of military activity ever again. However, the process can go too far the other way, and become detachment and non-responsibility rather than proper commitment to the world security order.

Finally, I should like to refer to the other external change that the reunification process is bringing about—a change that affects the whole architecture of Europe, and especially the development of the European Community in the broader sense. There is a phrase that one hears in Paris a lot: it is said that the whole aim of Community policy must now be to "lock in" the new united Germany. That phrase is, I feel mistaken: it implies somehow that that huge power is a sort of dangerous bear that must be kept on a chain by the rest of the European Community, which will teach it a thing or two about balance and democracy. Such a line of thought is insulting to the Germans, who have shown—as was emphasised by the hon. Member for Hamilton—that they are some of the best practitioners of democracy in the post-war world. They do not need "locking in"; they need to find their place—a central and important place—in the new European structure. Whatever some people in western Europe may say about "locking in", and about the need to concentrate on developing and deepening the existing Community structure, the plain fact is that Europe's centre of gravity has moved eastwards as a result of the GDR's joining the Federal Republic and creating the new Germany.

By accepting East Germany into the Community, we have also brought into our perspective the affairs and problems of the other European states of eastern Europe in a most intimate way; unless we recognise that, we shall lead ourselves into many errors. That is why I disagree with those who argue that, for the time being, we should think of European Community development as excluding the eastern European countries—that they should come along later, but should not be a priority now. If we are truly set on the process of European construction and development, that process must embrace as soon as possible not just the GDR—as it has done with amazing speed in a matter of a few weeks—but the neighbouring powers east of East Germany. If we do not do that, we shall be sowing dragons' teeth: the instability and chaos, the social pressures and the defeat of all western aims and policies will be very great.

It must be understood that the success of the new democracies—like the success of East Germany—is our success, and their failure is our failure. That is the spirit in which we must act if we wish to see open societies develop from here deep into Russian Asia—which, after all, is what we fought the second world war to do and failed, and what we persisted through a 40-year cold war to do and succeeded. That is the way in which to consolidate our earlier success.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I am pleased to follow the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, to whom we are indebted for a forward look on German unification—which, as he says, has now almost been overtaken by events. His was a useful contribution: he mentioned one aspect that might otherwise have been forgotten—the effect of the change in the status of the Länder of the GDR in relation to other emerging eastern European democracies.

The documents that we are considering contain the treaty arrangements and derogations that allow trade between those eastern European countries. I almost referred to them as "formerly members of COMECON"; I suppose that they are still formally members, although "formerly", with an "er", is pretty appropriate, too. The documents define in legislation the relationship between eastern Germany—indeed, the whole of the federal republic, and perhaps even the EEC—and the members of COMECON that are now changing their political arrangements.

Clearly, 1990 will go down in history—in the lifetime of all of us—as something of a political Clapham Junction, and this very month may mark both an end and a beginning. We are seeing the end of the post-war era in the peace treaty that will at last come as a result of German unification; the entry of Britain into the European exchange rate mechanism, which is the subject of controversy on both sides of the House and cannot be seen as a party matter; and the specific EEC legislation that we are considering this morning.

Before I deal with those topics, let me return to something that had been said about the European exchange rate mechanism—for all these mattters have been mentioned in Parliament this week. A reference was made to drivers' cabs. Surely, if we use the Clapham Junction theory of history, the comparison is not entirely accurate: on a railway the driver can go only where the lines are laid, and the route that he can choose—there is usually only one, not 12—will depend on the route set by the signalman, and on the speed of the signals. There is not the element of choice that some people might infer from such an analogy. But—if we are not talking about the driver—who, we must ask, will be the person or persons in the signal box? That is merely a passing comment—which I hope and trust is objectively correct—on the announcements made by the Government last week.

What we are debating today is the legislation consequent on political unification. Ours is a formidable agenda; an hon. Member whom I met earlier in the week asked, "Why a whole day on this?", but I fear that he may not have understood the total conspectus of history.

We are confronting a substantial legislative and documentary "meal". First, we have the four documents that we might regard as the hors d'oeuvres: the report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, HC 335; the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, HC 431; and the replies from the Government to those reports, in Cmnd 1246 and HC 645. We could engage in a whole day's debate on those documents alone. Next, we have the main meal—the vast COM(90)400, which, in the Minister's words, "banged on to his desk" during the recess: it is in three volumes, and contains 300-odd pages. That is the necessary legislation that the Select Committee on European Legislation has considered and attempted to summarise; our report is in the Vote Office, and will be printed as the 32nd report of our Committee this Session.

If we continue the meal analogy, we find ourselves faced with the bill—in the form of EEC document 8782/90, which is also being considered today. The total cost is probably prospective, and has been the subject of dispute between my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and the Minister. Ultimately—as with all financial matters—we shall have to wait and see.

The central document, COM(90)400, has three elements, which the Minister has in part described. On 17 September the Council of Ministers decided to adopt parts of the documents. The problem with this document is that, although it has one number—COM(90)400—there are about 34 elements within it, each of which, in more normal circumstances, might have been a single document. Two of the prime elements are procedural and constitutional. The document gave the Commission authority, as from 3 October, to produce documents which, until they were amended, became the law of the EEC and, therefore, the law of the United Kingdom. As the Minister has described, subsequent to that date they have been looked at one by one, and most of them have been either adjusted or agreed as acceptable to the United Kingdom.

Many of the documents would have been subject to majority voting or qualified majority voting anyway, even if they had not been accepted. However, it is reassuring to know that no substantial changes are envisaged at the moment, although, of course, we may discover that some things in the documents may have effects that we did not anticipate. I shall refer to that matter in a moment.

The 32 legislative documents—the Government have deposited in the Vote Office an explanatory memorandum on each—are in the process of being agreed. If agreed, they will last until the end of 1992 when the transitional period will come to an end. It will be assumed that, unless further transitional arrangements are made, the Länder of the former GDR will be fully integrated into the Community.

The third element in the document is volume 3, which outlines the financial considerations that are further followed up in document 8782/90. The Minister said that the net cost would be about 1,000 million ecu and that the net cost to this country will probably be about £30 million. Perhaps the Minister will confirm that the gross cost, as estimated in that document is about £3,000 million, and that the outcome will depend, of course, on what expenditure is made and what income is collected under the formula. Although the Government may be a little optimistic in their figures, the actual net cost to this country may not be as great as it looks at the moment.

The next aspect to which I draw attention is the unprecedented nature of the documents. I make no complaint about the necessity for them. Such legislation had to be in place by 3 October or there would have been a legislative vacuum. There can be no doubt about that. By agreement in Germany, unification was brought forward by about three months, and Her Majesty's Government had to act.

The legislation that had to fill the gap is not the sort to which we are used in this House, to which the nation as a whole has got used, and which we perhaps take for granted —certainly in the United Kingdom. When a Bill comes before us, certainly now in respect of private legislation and in procedural terms for public legislation, we hear of a petition for a Bill. The idea is that if we are to have a statute, or if the state is to invade common law or the freedom of the individual—that matter is very dear to the hearts of Conservative Members—there must be a petition stating why we need the legislation, why the monarch should do one thing and why Parliament should do the other. The purpose of the legislation is enshrined in the short and long titles. We then look at it and ask, "Are these powers necessary? Is this the right method? Is it the right policy?" After a long period of digestion, the legislation is agreed.

Legislation may give powers to the Executive of the day to exercise power in execution of the purposes of the necessary Act. As a result of that, regulations come before Parliament in statutory instruments. A Select Committee looks at them to ensure that they come within the scope of the powers given. In this House they are occasionally looked at on their merits when they are affirmative.

However, in this instance—again I make no complaint; the Government had no choice whatsoever—as the Minister properly said, the use of the prerogative, which has been habitually used by this Government and agreed by the House in respect of foreign affairs, was used in the Council of Ministers, again constitutionally properly, initially to validate legislation produced by the Commission, and subsequently, after a certain second look by the Council of Ministers, to become the new law of the Community. It fixes the relationship of businesses, firms and multitudinous matters in the United Kingdom with the new emerging Germany, and indeed with all our colleagues in the EEC.

That procedure has not been done by the due processes of the legislation to which we are habitually used. It has come about as a result of a prerogative act not only by the Government but by the Commission itself, for the Council of Ministers was incapable of producing that legislation. There was no petition and no consultation by the Council. It has to reject or accept the Commission's proposals. Therefore, to this extent it is fair to say that this set of regulations and directives, although inevitable, marks the most extensive example yet of a different sort of legislation being looked at by the House.

What, then, of the role of scrutiny? That will be discussed on Wednesday of next week, and I hope that many hon. Members will be present. Until now, scrutiny in this House has been of matters in which powers have been given by the House when the effects have been known and the merits have been debated. But scrutiny of EEC legislation is not quite of the same character. On this occasion we have a problem through speed, which is almost inevitable arising out of this political situation.

If a future problem were to arise—of course it is unlikely to be of the same nature—or if there were an economic problem of great significance to the work of the Community, perhaps arising out of the Gulf situation—let us hope that it would be solved—or some other world cataclysm, similar types of legislation, but perhaps not on such a grand scale, relating to energy or some other matter, could be put before us in a similar way.

I now refer to the problem that was highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamiliton (Mr. Robertson). We did our best with the documents and had our report out late on Tuesday evening or early on Wednesday for the debate today. If we are to have proper scrutiny and fulfil our part of what is sometimes called the democratic deficit there must be sufficient time. Almost as important, if not more important, is sufficient publicity of the proposals. My hon. Friend referred to our report, which we released as fast as we could, but there is sometimes a lack of distribution of reports of the Select Committee on European Legislation to the nation as a whole. If firms, organisations and interests are to be aware of what is proposed, they must have access to reports to the House which are publicly available from Her Majesty's Stationery Office. People often complain about the secrecy of official matters. A great deal of information about that kind of legislation is publicly available in reports of the Select Committee on European Legislation.

Unfortunately, events have not allowed time for the normal digestion of the meal that I have outlined on this occasion. That has been inevitable. However, having drawn the attention of the House to the ambit of the proposals and their context, I hope that I have been able to advertise the work of the Select Committee on European Legislation and the reports which its members and staff produce.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): I want to make two or three points about the broader aspects rather than concentrate on the detailed regulations. I am not sure what contacts the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) has had. I can only say that over the past four years I have mixed with West German politicians of all parties, I have visited Poland and I have had discussions with Bulgarians and Yugoslavs who are part of the new democratic process. They paid tribute to the work of this country and this Government. If the hon. Member for Hamilton had spoken to people on the spot, he would realise that his comments about my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister bear no relation to reality. The hon. Gentleman may mix in strange circles comprising crypto-socialists. I can assure him that people from behind the iron curtain say that they defeated socialism in action and not just communism and that comes from the people who live in the area, some of whom have been in prison for 20 years. Listening to those people moved me greatly and I realised how lucky we are to live in a democratic institution such as this.

Mr. Robertson: I do not deny that the hon. Gentleman is entitled to his opinion. However, in most of those communist countries, if someone was a democratic socialist like many Opposition Members of this House, that person could have been imprisoned just like a Thatcherite right-winger. The rejection of communism does not mean a rejection of democratic socialism in any of those countries or in western Europe as a whole.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I fear that that view is not shared by many people who live in those countries. However, I do not deny that socialists and trade unionists as well as Church people were imprisoned, but the basic fact is that socialism was put into action. I thought that the hon. Member for Hamilton spoilt a very good speech by his unnecessary attacks on my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and he moved away from reality. That was a great pity.

Mr. Tony Banks: Oh!

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: If the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) wants to intervene, he can, but he will isolate himself as he has done so often in the Council of Europe in the company of one other of his colleagues.

Sir Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Does my hon. Friend agree that the beginning of the process of democratisation occurred when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister visited Poland and set alight the torch for freedom?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Indeed, and I pay tribute to the Poles for the part that they played in that process. I am only sad that in the process of democratisation they are taking somewhat longer to have full and free elections than I had hoped. As a rapporteur for the Council of Europe, I visited Poland several times and I was saddened that the process has taken longer there than many of us had wanted.

Over the next 12 months several eastern and central European countries will become members of the Council of Europe. I take slight issue with my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) who is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. Before those countries can be admitted to the Community, we must be satisfied that they are democracies fully observing human rights. That is why the Council of Europe has been and is a far better bridge than the Community. Once they are inside the Council of Europe they can go forward a stage further. We must recognise that the Community is a Community of 12. The Council of Europe now has 23 members with six guest members and it will soon be a Council of 30. We cannot ignore what has happened in that institution over the past two years. I recognise how fortunate many of us have been to have taken part in the work of the Council of Europe and of the Western European Union, both of which are playing their part in pushing democracy forward.

Mr. David Howell: I do not dispute for a moment what my hon. Friend has said about the immensely important role of the Council of Europe and we should all recognise his substantial contribution to the Council's work and development. It is clearly more than a staging post. It is part of the process by which the construction and development of Europe will be carried forward. He was right to emphasise the human rights and democratisation aspects, which must progress still further in all those countries, and the Council of Europe plays a central role in that. I fully endorse what my hon. Friend said.

Mr. Dykes: I echo the tributes to my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) for his work as head of the Council of Europe delegation from this country. I wholeheartedly agree with him that the Council of Europe is the ideal first bridge for those countries. Does he agree that that also helps the resolution of a possible dispute between the widening and deepening of the Community? It will take time for those countries to begin to become established parliamentary democracies and to show that they can continue to be such democracies without upsets, coups d'état or developing military regimes, which may occur because of their often very sad political histories in recent decades. Does my hon. Friend agree that there need be no built-in contradiction between the deepening of the Community, which so many members of the existing 12 now want to go ahead with political, economic and monetary union, starting from the December conferences, and the widening that will occur later? Inevitably, we must wait for those new fledgling democracies to prove their durability as democracies—and I do not say that in a spirit of condescension—and those countries will need long transitional periods because of the weakness of their economies.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I should be wise not to enter the morass of widening and deepening and simply stick by what I have already said. Stage one must be full membership of the Council of Europe. Stages two and three may well follow, but I do not want to look that far ahead.

Today's debate is about Germany and I went there as chairman of the election observers of the Council of Europe. I want to relate some of my experiences because they throw into sharp relief what happened suddenly in the German Democratic Republic.

I went out to Germany on the Wednesday before election day. I drove in my taxi to the nearest crossing point to my hotel, but the taxi was sent back by the East German border guard. We were told that we could go only through checkpoint Charlie. We went through checkpoint Charlie and my money was entered on a form and my passport carefully scrutinsed by a very grim-faced guard and we eventually got through.

I left on the Monday, having issued a press statement saying that we were satisfied that the elections were fully fair and free. We went back through checkpoint Charlie and a smiling East German guard wanted to see neither passport nor money form. That was a very sudden change. I hope that it reflected the fact that the guard was merely anticipating the orders that he was to be given by the new Government. That memory remains with me.

I also remember going to a polling station in a small country village about 60 miles outside east Berlin. I saw an old lady enter the polling station. She took a piece of paper and marked her ballot form. She came out in tears. I have only schoolboy German, so with the help of an interpreter I asked why she had burst into tears. I was told that she had come to vote freely for the first time since the early 1930s and that her husband had died the previous day, so had not had the chance to vote. That has made me realise how fortunate we are to be able to go to polling stations with no worries when elections are called.

On the night of the election results I was in the Volkskammer. At the end of the evening I was asked to go on German television with a representative of the West German Christian Democrats. The commentator asked both of us, "How long do you think it will be before there is full unification?" I deferred to my West German colleague, who replied, "About 18 months or two years at the very earliest." I said that I could not argue with that, but that it would take some time to complete all the formalities. Nobody anticipated the speed with which unification would take place. As my hon. Friend the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee said, exchange rates and the economic situation forced an amazing change in speed. As we look back with the most valuable asset of politicians, hindsight, we might have realised that a sudden rush was inevitable. In those circumstances, we have made remarkable progress and everybody is to be congratulated on the speed and apparent smoothness with which we have seen unification take place.

Paragraph 12 of the Government's observations on the fourth report deals with the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe and concludes:

"One of the CSCE's most important roles . . . will be to allow the East Europeans a forum in which to discuss their security concerns. The report touches on the question of security guarantees for them. The CSCE could not provide these: it is a political, not a military organisation, and lacks the common purpose necessary to become the latter."

If it is a political institution, its one lack is a democratic wing. I pay enormous tribute to all that CSCE has done since its inception and the Helsinki agreement. Without the agreement I am not sure whether the logjam would suddenly have disappeared. The fact that the Soviets agreed to allow other countries to discuss human rights issues in the Soviet Union, focused the spotlight on what was happening. Much has flowed from that.

CSCE is operating successfully, but there is no political check on its work. Ministers meet and take decisions. Civil servants meet and take decisions—sometimes in anticipation of what their Ministers may want and at other times assuming delegated powers. There is not an institution composed of democratically elected Members of Parliament from the 35 CSCE nations where Ministers can be asked what they are doing, why they are doing it and be questioned on a wide variety of issues. I believe and the Council of Europe believes that it is necessary for such a democratic wing to be formed quickly. In September the Council of Europe took the initiative and devoted a day and a half to CSCE matters under its auspices, but as a separate legal entity.

Mr. Tony Banks: What has been the British Government's response to the discussions that took place in Strasbourg on the creation of a parliamentary wing of the CSCE process? For the record, can the hon. Gentleman justify how he believes that for the CSCE process, which is based on a wider Europe, we should have a parliamentary wing that also includes elected representatives from the United States of America and Canada?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The hon. Gentleman, who is a valuable and valued colleague on the United Kingdom delegation to the Council of Europe, occasionally expresses his own views. The difference between this Parliament and the Council of Europe is that his superb sedentary interventions are never translated there. It is a pity that they do not have some sort of simultaneous translation from the seat.

The British Government are sympathetic to the need for some sort of democratic body. Mr. Gorbachev, and everybody else, recognises that there is a vital link with north America. He has said that he recognises that the common European house needs a north American input. As major contributors to the work of CSCE, it is right that the Americans and Canadians should participate fully in a parliamentary wing.

During the day and a half on CSCE we tried to invite all 35 countries to the Council of Europe. I was fortunate enough to be made chairman of the working party organising it. In the end we had every country except the United States. The President of the Council of Europe was told that the United States could not come because in September it was in the middle of budget discussions and having a difficult time.

The Canadian representative was also in difficulty because although he was personally in favour of the concept, he had not had an opportunity to discuss it with his colleagues. He abstained from what was otherwise an almost unanimous vote, passing the resolution calling for the creation of a parliamentary wing of CSCE and a set of guidelines. I know from my conversations with him that he was returning to Canada with the intention of selling the idea to the Canadians.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman recounts how the Canadian representative could not vote because his Parliament had not discussed the matter. Will he say when we shall have an opportunity to discuss the proposal for a parliamentary wing of CSCE, so that we can decide whether we want to progress towards it?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I can give the hon. Gentleman a two-part answer. First, I have never been part of the usual channels who are responsible for organising such debates. Secondly, I am certain that with his immense influence in the Labour party the hon. Gentleman can persuade his Chief Whip to devote an Opposition day to the matter. That is entirely up to him.

Many other hon. Members wish to speak, so I shall conclude. I am convinced that if we are to see democracies fully established in eastern and central Europe and to avoid coups d'état and the like, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) mentioned earlier —I see that he has temporarily left us—we must look at what is happening and see what support our political parties can provide. All parties can help their opposite numbers in those countries. We must try to show them not that it is fairly simple to have a party, which it is—at present there are some 78 parties in the Ukraine, one of the Soviet republics. Goodness knows how many parties there will be to fight the elections for the Polish lower House, but few of them will be recognisable parties in our scale of knowledge.

In Poland, Solidarity encompassed everyone. Perhaps the greatest contribution, other than that of Mr. Gorbachev, who made it clear that no force would be used, came from the Churches, both Protestant and Catholic, under whose embrella it was possible to discuss human rights, whether in East Germany, Poland or Hungary. Poland's ambrella organisation, Solidarity, represented all from left to right. As Solidarity begins to wonder how to fight coming elections—the presidential election and the elections for the Sejm in April or May—a factionalism will begin to arise in that country. It will surely be then, if we can identify a party close to our own, that we can give it whatever guidance it seeks about how to build up the grassroots organisation that is needed. It is true that in Poland there have been fully fair and free municipal elections, but there have not been the sort of grassroots organisations that we know. We must help Poland to build up such organisations, as we must in Hungary and other countries.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State was absolutely right when he said at the beginning of the debate that, following the unification of Germany, we have an opportunity to have a future that is secure for at least two generations to come. A new Germany, a democratic Germany, as part of a variety of communities—the Community, the Council of Europe, the Western European Union and the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation—provides opportunities for co-operation between the powers of the west and the east. It is not far-fetched to say that within a decade there may well be a security organisation encompassing both east and west. As we have seen in the Gulf, the real dangers against both east and west lie in unexpected quarters.

We must watch carefully to ensure that we do not have a euphoria of disarmament that goes so far that it leaves us at the mercy of blackmailers from insignificant, fourth-world countries that may possess chemical or nuclear weapons. If we in the east and west get rid of those, we could be blackmailed and should have little choice in what we had to do. Let us not be too euphoric, but at the same time take the opportunities that arise from the unification of Germany to establish a firm working relationship with the Soviet Union and the countries of eastern and central Europe. In that way, we can enter the 21st century with a large degree of confidence.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): My speech will be much more parochial than that of the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) , though not chauvinistic. My concern focuses on the economic and social implications of German unification for various maritime communities in Scotland and elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

When I served as a young national service man in the then British zone of West Germany, facing members of the Volkspolizei, a few yards across the border, I never dreamed that I would live to see a united Germany. I thought that there would always be some sort of iron curtain during my lifetime. As a young national service man, I visited Berlin about a year before the horrible wall was built. As a young man, trade unionist and socialist, I could not envisage that those awful barriers would be dismantled.

I welcome the unification of Germany, as wholeheartedly and warmly as any hon. Member, but that process could—I stress "could"—present formidable economic and social problems for a number of coastal communities scattered around the Scottish coastline and its islands. I shall comment on three matters related to German unification that are arousing considerable concern in Scotland. The first is the distribution of structural funds. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Curry), who is present has some knowledge of that subject. Secondly, I am concerned about our shipbuilding industry, or should I say the vestigial remnants of our once-glorious shipbuilding industry. Thirdly, and this worry will not surprise the Parliamentary Secretary, I am concerned about the need to defend our fishing industries and fishing communities. I know that the Parliamentary Secretary will support me in that.

Structural funds have played an important part in revitalising some badly run-down districts of the Strathclyde region in Scotland. As every hon. Member knows, Strathclyde regional council is about the biggest local authority in the European Community. My colleagues on that council are extremely skilful in obtaining funds under the social fund network for some of our deeply deprived communities. That also holds true for other communities as far north as Shetland. In the Shetland islands, the structural funds played an important part in maintaining communities that might have simply died away without such assistance. Therefore, there is a good deal of support in Scotland for the European Community, especially in relation to the distribution of structural funds.

However, I am a little concerned about what is written in the explanatory memorandum. On pages 6 and 7, the report of the Select Committee on European Legislation says of the structural funds that the Department of Trade and Industry

"recalls that the Community is proposing that new commitment appropriations of 3 thousand million ECU be allocated to the EC Structural Funds for the period 1991-1993 for East Germany following unification."

No one would dispute that. There are communities in what I would now call eastern Germany that are badly in need of such aid.

The report of the Committee, which was chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), and in which I had some hand, continues:

"This does not affect the United Kingdom's entitlements under the Structural Funds during this period. However, from 1994, survey information could be used to identify areas within East Germany which are to receive aid from the Structural Funds and this could have an effect on the future distribution of aid between Member States. The Department has also pointed out that it is too early to say at this stage what effect this might have for future United Kingdom receipts for the structural funds."

Many Scottish voluntary associations, local authorities and other interested bodies genuinely believe that if the financial assistance from the structural fund is to go to communities in eastern Germany, it must follow that there will be a reduction in the distribution of the fund to communities in Scotland. I do not think that that is a selfish or greedy concern. Certain areas of Scotland still suffer massive unemployment. My constituency is traditionally a shipbuilding, marine engineering and other maritime industrial community, and it still has one of the worst unemployment rates in the whole of the United Kingdom. It is in about seventh or eighth position in the dreadful league of unemployment. When I speak to Tory Members from the south-east, I sometimes think that I would give my right arm to have the unemployment rates in their constituencies. My remarks also hold good for constituencies in Glasgow, Ayr and further north.

By all means, let every assistance be given to equally beleaguered communities in eastern Germany, but Scottish communities, which are bedevilled by such disgracefully high levels of unemployment, must continue to receive support from Brussels. I was especially anxious to make that point this morning, although I do not wish to take up the time of the House. I always make brief interventions.

The Clyde is now but a remnant of what was once a major industry and employer. I recently had the good fortune to visit the QE2 when she berthed in Greenock as part of the celebrations of the Cunard company. It was a remarkable moment when she slipped away from the terminal to head down the Firth of Clyde. She is a magnificent example of Clyde shipbuilding and marine engineering skills. I regret that today, we do not have a shipyard that could build a successor to the QE2.

Yarrows, a famous naval shipyard on the upper Clyde, may face serious problems because of what we call the peace dividend and because of the decision of the Ministry of Defence to cut the surface fleet to 40. Some 5,000 jobs depend directly or indirectly on Yarrows. There is a direct labour force of 3,392, and indirect employment and suppliers account for another 1,500 jobs. A firm such as Yarrows must be given assistance to meet the changing circumstances of the so-called peace dividend, which I welcome. Also on the upper Clyde is the famous Govan yard, which is now owned by the Norwegian firm Kvaerner. That provides several thousand jobs in my constituency, directly and indirectly. There is a small yard, Fergusons, in my constituency, which employs fewer than 100 highly-skilled people. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) mentioned a day or two ago, that constituency's shipyard is under threat of closure. We must give those yards the sort of support that the European Commission envisages being given to shipyards in eastern Germany.

The explanatory memorandum from the Department of Trade and Industry states:

"Under the terms of the EEC Commission's legislative proposals to deal with German unification, the provisions of the proposed Seventh Directive"— currently, there is a sixth directive that expires on 31 December—

"will be directly applied to restructuring aid provided to East German shipyards. Under the terms of a special clause which will be added to the proposals for the Seventh Directive, East German shipyards will be permitted a higher level of operating aid than the level allowed for other Member States during the period of restructuring."

I am not at all happy with that proposal. Why should yards in eastern Germany be given more aid than yards on the Clyde and the Mersey?

I want to ask the Minister a question, although I appreciate that it does not fall within his responsibilities. I hope that he will convey it to his counterpart in the Department of Trade and Industry. Are east German yards to be given unfair advantages over other European yards under the Commission's regulation on procurement? I understand that procurement has to be fair and equal throughout the European Community. If so, is not it likely that yards given those unfair advantages could conceivably win orders from the United Kingdom that would otherwise have been placed with our shipyards? That is an important point.

I shall give the House an example. Soon, Caledonian MacBrayne, whose passenger ferry fleet serves all the islands of Scotland and provides an essential link with the mainland for those island communities, will be ordering a new vessel to replace the Suilven, which sails between Ullapool on the mainland and Stornoway in the Western Isles. Hon. Members will not be surprised to hear that I hope that the order for that vessel will be given to Fergusons in Port Glasgow—I did warn the House that I would be parochial—which would produce a first-class ship. I keep badgering the Secretary of State for Scotland to ensure that the order is given to the lower Clyde. However, it is conceivable that an east German yard, with its additional aid, could win the order because, under the regulation on procurement, it would have the right to bid for a vessel that will provide such an essential service between the mainland and the outer Hebrides. That is an important point for Scotland.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Will not another factor be the lower wage levels in eastern Germany, at least until the period of transition has ended, which will put competitors there in a more favourable position?

Dr. Godman: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's powerful intervention. He is absolutely right. I am an ex-shipwright, though it is a long time since I worked in a shipyard, thank heaven, so I know that the cost of constructing a ship is determined to a considerable extent by labour costs. One of the reasons why the gap between the cost of building a ship in a European Community yard and in Japan or South Korea is beginning to diminish is the increase in wage levels in south-east Asia. That is particularly true of South Korea, where massive civil disturbances have in some cases focused on the large shipyards of Hyundai and Daewoo. The aim of the intervention fund is to provide Community yards with funds, so that they can come near to bridging the gap between the cost of a ship in Europe and in a south-east Asian yard.

Deep concern is felt by my constituents and all shipyard workers that they may suffer as a consequence of the advantages enjoyed by their counterparts in eastern Germany. I know of no shipyard worker in my constituency who wants to see any harm done to the interests of their counterparts in eastern Germany, but British shipyard workers should not be forced on to the dole queues because of the clause that is to be added to the seventh directive. If such a provision is to be made, a further clause should be included to provide additional assistance to shipyards in constituencies such as mine that suffer high unemployment.

There is also an important strategic reason to be taken into consideration. Apart from the Kvaerner yard at Govan, which is largely concerned with the construction of liquid petroleum gas carriers for that company's own fleet, and Harland and Wolff at Belfast, Britain does not possess the merchant ship building capability for large vessels such as very large or ultra-large crude carriers. That is to some extent shown by the problems in maritime transport that have arisen in transporting military equipment to Saudi Arabia.

By all means let us help the shipbuilding communities of eastern Germany, but at the same time we must arrest the dreadful decline in the United Kingdom's merchant shipbuilding capacity. To do that, and to generate valuable employment on the Clyde, Yarrows should be given assistance to diversify in the types of vessel that it can build. I should also like to see Scott Lithgow in my constituency allowed to acquire what I would term European Community shipbuilding intervention fund status. Scott Lithgow has the biggest merchant shipbuilding facility in the United Kingdom. Nothing else like it exists anywhere in the United Kingdom. Recently, a British tanker firm, keen to have its ships built in the United Kingdom, approached Scott Lithgow for a provisional price for constructing four VLCCs. Scott Lithgow had to say that it could not submit a realistic tender because it did not have access to the intervention fund, which currently provides 20 per cent. of the cost of constructing a vessel.

If Scotland's interests are ignored in respect of its shipbuilding and fishing industries, I must tell the House, and particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), who cannot be present for very good reasons, that more and more Scots may start listening to the seductive blandishments of the Scottish National party and to its arguments for an independent Scotland within the framework of the European Community.

Recent opinion polls strongly indicate that more and more Scots are viewing the nationalists' seductive but empty arguments with considerable favour. Those polls suggest that as many as 40 per cent. of Scots are not frightened of the prospect of independence within Europe. That should be borne in mind as we see Scotland's shipbuilding and fishing industries apparently being ignored by the House, and is why I asked the Leader of the House yesterday for a debate on our maritime industries.

I turn finally to the problems of the fishing industry, in which, I am pleased to say, the Parliamentary Secretary has a fair degree of knowledge and expertise. I may not always agree with what he tells our fishermen, but the Minister is, as they say in that industry, a knowledgeable lad.

The United Kingdom fishing industry is small in the numbers that it employs directly and indirectly, and in its share of the country's gross domestic product. Nevertheless, it is an extremely important industry to many small coastal communities throughout the United Kingdom's mainland and islands. That is true of Cornwall as much as of Northern Ireland, and the industry is a major source of employment in Scotland.

I have the pleasure of serving as one of the honorary presidents of the Clyde Fishermans Association, which is known to the Minister, as do several other right hon. and hon. Members, including the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie)—who ought to be contributing to this debate—and my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). All would say that it is essential to defend the Scottish fishing industry with the utmost vigour. I also have a commitment to the English fishing industry. My brother is working as a mate on a big freezer trawler, fishing for cod off the west coast of Greenland, so I am not being too parochial. I am worried about the new Germany's fishing fleet, and its impact on the European Community's fleets. I am not being alarmist when I say that many people in the United Kingdom industry are worried about this new fleet.

The East German fishing fleet is ancient. Hon. Members would never catch me going on board some of their ships, even if they were just crossing the Clyde, the Mersey or the Humber. I certainly would not go up into the Arctic in one of those lumbering old ladies. The best thing that the Minister could do is urge his German counterparts to scrap the entire fleet, because ships that are ancient can be a danger to their crews in bad weather.

Returning to the fine report produced by the Select Committee, it states on page 11 that:

"The Commission reiterates that the capacity of the existing Community fleet is already disproportionately high compared to the limited resources available and so integration of the fishing fleet of the former GDR (whose overall capacity is 3·8 per cent of the Community fleet) poses political problems"— not merely political problems but dangers for our fishermen—

"It is also suggested that in the case of Community resources not subject to TACs"— total allowable catches—

"and quotas, access by the former GDR fleet to areas such as the North Sea, the west of Scotland, the Irish sea and the Bay of Biscay could result in disturbance to stocks"— that is an understatement—

"There could also be problems of principle for Spain and Portugal whose fleets, unlike that of a unified Germany, do not enjoy the same rights of access. The Commission makes it clear that it will be watching carefully how the activities of the new fleet develop and, where appropriate, will take this into account in the revision of the Common Fisheries Policy (CFP) planned for 1991."

The Commissioners need to do much more than watch this carefully. This development has to be policed in the same way that our excellent fisheries protection service polices our waters—nothing less will do.

I want an assurance, or a reassurance, today from the Minister that there will be no access to the North sea or the west of Scotland. Some of us in the west of Scotland are saying that we should not allow fishing vessels from the north-east of Scotland to come round the corner and put down their multi-trawls. The Minister never listens to me when I talk about banning such gear. We are worried about trawlers from the north-east of Scotland—that will not win me many brownie points up there—let alone vessels lumbering through the Pentland Firth from eastern Germany. Such developments have to be policed very carefully.

Mr. Spearing: I was afraid to interrupt such a fascinating account, but if my hon. Friend is demonstrating—through his personal knowledge and constituency interests—the impact on fishing and shipbuilding of these arrangements, which may last for a couple of years or even longer, what impact might the arrangements have in other areas? The document contains at least 25 other areas of interest. Was not it perhaps a little optimistic for the Minister to say in his introduction to the debate that most of these arrangements are broadly satisfactory to the United Kingdom? Judging by what my hon. Friend is saying, is not it likely that there could be some nasty surprises in store?

Dr. Godman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me of what the Minister said in the introduction to his otherwise fine speech. Where shipbuilding, the fishing industry and the structural fund are concerned these arrangements are certainly not satisfactory to many people. If the Minister is talking about the Government's point of view, that is one thing, but for many people in my constituency and in Scotland these are far from satisfactory matters and my constituents are deeply worried. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention.

Two or three years ago I sought an assurance from the Prime Minister that the review of the common fisheries policy would not lead to any diminution in the rights quite properly given to the United Kingdom's fishing fleet. At that time my eyes were fixed firmly on the huge Spanish fishing fleet which was slowly steaming over the horizon. I never thought that I would need to look towards the east.

I have great affection for the Spanish people, especially those in Andalusia, but I cannot abide Spanish fishing interests. They are the worst poachers in the European Community fishing industry, and one cannot trust them —they swap licences around. In Vigo they have a club; if a skipper is caught and fined, his fine is paid by an informal insurance system. I know that that is the case because one of my cousins was a skipper on one of those ships, so I have first-hand knowledge.

When I sought an assurance from the Prime Minister —which the right hon. Lady readily gave—she said that she would defend the interests of our fishermen with the utmost vigour. I was satisfied with her assurance, but when the Minister winds up the debate I shall be looking for a similar assurance from him about our fishermen's interests.

I said that I was going to be parochial and I have focused on three issues: the distribution of certain structural funds, which is important to many Scottish communities, and two maritime industries, shipbuilding and fishing. While I warmly welcome the unification of Germany, the assistance given to the fishing and shipbuilding industries there should not exceed that given to people employed in those industries in Britain—assistance to which they are legitimately entitled.

I have one final question for the Minister—is the aid, or part of it, that is to be given to the eastern German shipbuilding communities to be used for assisting with training or retraining of redundant shipyard workers? There are many thousands of shipyard workers in eastern Germany. Will part of the financial package be given to workers who are keen to set up small community businesses and community-based co-operatives? That is the kind of assistance that they should be given. The assistance that they are given should not enable them, by means of unfair competition, to close down yards in Scotland and in the other countries of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): It is a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). He has given the House details. That is appropriate in terms of the documents that we are discussing. He has filled me with knowledge. Until today I had no idea that our inability to build a successor to the QE2 was due to the large-scale migration of Scottish shipwrights to the Palace of Westminster. He has also told me about a new species of bird—a Spanish-speaking, fish-eating vulture. I shall not give so many details in my speech and I shall make no prediction about the length of my speech. It is clear from experience that speakers cannot accurately predict how long their speeches will last.

We are debating the most tangible result, so far, of the break-up of the Russian empire. Like most hon. Members, if not all, in the House, with one manifest exception, I am part of one of the luckiest generations ever to have been born. I was too young to take part in the second world war. I have lived all my life in a country where it has been possible to enjoy a level of prosperity that had never been reached before. I have more spare time, a higher disposable income and a better quality of life than that enjoyed by any previous generation.

It is important for my generation to remember that it forms part of the 15 per cent. of the world's population that uses up 85 per cent. of the world's energy resources and that we owe a great deal of that prosperity to two major factors. First, we owe it to the extraordinary generosity of the United States in 1945, which perceived that there was a clear altruistic interest and self-interest in making it possible for the war-ravaged economies of Europe to rebuild themselves on the back of American money.

Secondly, a substantial part of Europe was locked in by a tyranny unexampled in history. More people have been killed, tortured and imprisoned in the Soviet empire than in any other empire in history. To the people who have began to emerge from under that tyrannical ice we owe a great deal of support and practical assistance, of the same kind—albeit delivered by different mechanisms—as that which the Americans offered to us after the second world war.

I believe that certain hon. Members, most of whom are on the other side of the House, but not entirely, perhaps, believe, as does the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), that any involvement with the European mainland is fraught with danger, enormously expensive and totally misguided. They have no clear perception of recent history. The truth is that, with only short bursts of isolationism, this country has been involved with mainland Europe throughout the whole of this century and for many centuries before.

Dr. Godman: The apparent detest for continental Europe, expressed so forcefully by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), is surely shared by many of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues.

Mr. Rowe: I said that I did not feel that that belief was held wholly and exclusively by Opposition Members. It is unfortunate that the hon. Member for Bolsover's assaults on my hon. Friend the Minister gain spurious clarity and effectiveness from the fact that, as so often, he did not stay to listen to the debate of which the Minister's speech was a part.

I believe firmly that we have been involved in Europe in the least constructive way possible. Time and again we have gone into Europe to fight great wars, or to clear up the mess of the great wars that we have had to fight and win. That is by far the least effective way to spend resources. It is destructive of life and peace. I am delighted that once again we have an opportunity to put an end to that for ever. To suggest that it is better to have large armed forces, paid for out of the national budget, sitting in Europe in order to keep the peace rather than getting ourselves properly involved in Europe, whereby we could ensure that war does not break out again, is a perversion of the truth.

I had the privilege to listen recently to a leading member of the Christian Democrats in West Germany speaking about recent developments. He used an example that I shall shamelessly steal from him. He said that there is no alternative to moving very fast indeed and that there are strong humanitarian reasons, apart from any other reasons, for moving quickly towards unification. He used as an example the Trabant car factory. Many of us saw Trabant cars for the first time as they came through the hole in the Berlin wall from east to west. The factory, he said, employs 65,000 people to make 12,000 cars that sell for DM15,000. The day that the wall came down, East Germans had access to Volkswagen Golfs. They sell for DM12,000 and are made by 7,000 workers. Not surprisingly, since the wall came down not a single Trabant car has been sold. The effect of that—it is almost funny at one level—is that 65,000 workers in East Germany have nothing useful to do and the plant in which they were employed is valueless. It cannot be changed, modified or used, so it will be destroyed.

Mr. Tony Banks: As an owner of a C5, perhaps I am not the best person to talk about Trabants. There is some worth in the concept of having a car that is exactly the same in all respects. I cannot think of anything more wasteful than the development money and the money that is poured into creating more models on the internal combustion engine principle with four wheels and four seats attached to them. The idea of producing one car that is standard throughout is quite good. I do not think that the East Germans were altogether wrong, and the hon. Gentleman should be fairer to the Trabant.

Mr. Rowe: I made no comment whatever on the quality or design of the Trabant. However, if 65,000 workers are required to build the same number of cars a year as are built elsewhere by 7,000 workers, there is little chance of that manufacturer surviving.

Some two thirds of the East German bureaucracy will no longer be necessary. If there had not been an urgent unification of the two Germanys, there would have been no social security system for those people. For humanitarian reasons, it was necessary to move rapidly.

The same is true of the Russian soldiers in East Germany. When the deutschmark was linked, Russian soldiers in East Germany were unable to buy anything. It is still commonplace to see them begging in the streets and selling their equipment, cap badges and everything else. The Germans have made a practical and generous settlement with the Russians: they will not only supply DM4 billion a year until the troops return home but, as we heard from my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), will build them the flats that they require to return home to, which must be unprecedented.

The costs of German unification have only just begun to emerge—DM100 billion to DM120 billion of Government expenditure alone. No one can foretell how much it will cost the private banking system and private companies to regenerate East German industry, but the cost will be enormous. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, that will give Britain an opportunity to take advantage of 16 million new consumers, many of whom have considerable resources because they were unable to spend their money on goods and have been saving it. I understand that one of the problems for the Bundesbank is how to allow that money to start circulating without causing considerable inflation. That must be an opportunity for British industry, and I very much hope that it will overcome its lack of German-speaking skill, get in there and create a market.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford said that if there had not been rapid reunification, there would have been rapid movements of population. The break-up of the Russian empire presents western Europe with one of the biggest potential problems that it has had to face. Realistic estimates of the number of people who may leave the Soviet Union run as high as 23 million. Where will they go? With the exception of the Jews, they will travel west if they can. In many cases, they will travel to countries that are already struggling to emerge from under the Soviet yoke, which have no resources of their own and which are looking to join the European Community. For that reason, if not for humanitarian reasons, it must pay western Europe to work out a way of financing those people to stay in their own countries. It will not be easy, because, goodness knows, the Soviet Union is on the point of break-up. Regardless of whether the republics finally sign the treaty of union that is being painfully hammered out in Moscow, in real terms central control from Moscow will soon cease to be a reality in most of the Soviet republics.

We must take seriously the movement of population. The idea that if we shut our eyes to it, we can stand aloof from what is happening in eastern Europe is a chimera of the most dangerous kind. It has been calculated that the Russian Jews moving into Israel are likely to boost Israel's GNP by about 13 per cent. for the next four years. Where will those people live? I am sure that I am not the only Member who has the uneasy feeling that they will be put in the country that is claimed by the Palestinians. That will create a vast international problem of which we must take cognisance.

It must be right to encourage people to stay where they are. That will be done by a guarantee that their human rights will be observed. Many of these people would stay where they are, despite the financial attractions of moving, if they were sure that they would not be persecuted and their places of worship closed and if they were allowed freedom to exercise their human rights. That is why the Helsinki process has been so important. It is why the Council of Europe spends so much of its time trying to make sure that the countries that want to belong to the Council as new members have a secure human rights mechanism. That is why it is important that effective means are found of making sure that the Stasi, the Securitate, the secret police of all these countries—which had vast numbers and have almost disappeared from view—are not given the opportunity or the desire to organise themselves as a counterbalance to the legitimate democracies.

We must also take account of the large enclaves of people of different races, languages and religions who come from other countries. In Czechoslovakia, it is encouraging to find not only that the Slovaks and Czechs are determined to make their federation work but that the Hungarian minority has no intention of breaking away. The people are working extremely hard in the face of great difficulty to create federal and republic constitutions that will guarantee basic rights to the Hungarians. That is one reason why national frontiers in Europe generally must be of decreasing importance as the years go by.

All of us must have been reassured when it was agreed that the boundaries of the German Republic would be inviolate and would stay as they were. In the end, the guarantee that some troublemaker in the future will not use these minorities in the way that Hitler used minorities to stir up trouble, giving the pretext for armed intervention, will come when national frontiers cease to be of prime importance. It is clear that, so far, many workers in East Germany show no interest in construction work or manual work of any kind. They want to get on to the white collar ladder. If manual work is to be done, it will probably be done by people from Poland. It is essential that those people are welcomed into the Council of Europe as soon as possible and eventually into an enlarged European Community, although that will take some time.

Another pressure making the anxiety and understandable caution about losing a part of some national characteristic in the wider whole so irrelevant is the enormous compulsion of environmental protection. It is bizarre to imagine that we can protect the environment on the basis of historical national fronters. The announcement this week that the Elbe is to be the first of the great European rivers to be subjected to a multinational agreement to try to clean it up and to protect it is one of the developments that has given me more encouragement than anything else this week. The great European rivers are destroying not only themselves, but the North sea, and must be looked after by all the riparian owner countries through which the rivers flow working together.

One of the least encouraging features of my recent life was when I addressed in Strasbourg a group of young people, many of whom came from eastern European countries. No sooner were they given the chance to ask questions than they going for one another because of the pollution that each was causing to the others. The Czechs were going at the Poles and the Poles at the Hungarians. It was an appalling scene, with young people with the whole of their lives in front of them and who were just emerging from one of the worst tyrannies that the world has seen attacking each other instead of trying to work together.

In our generation, we have the finest opportunity ever to create a new European order in which national boundaries will gradually cease to be of anything like their importance hitherto. I want to be parochial for a moment, and to pay tribute to Kent county council and to some of the district councils in Kent that have taken the initiative and signed agreements with the Nord-Pas de Calais. They are engaged in training, educational and commercial exchanges, and they are hoping for industrial exchanges because they have realised that once the channel tunnel is built, the channel will be a meaningless division between the Nord-Pas de Calais and Kent. I admire and respect those councils for that. Their agreements, in their parochial way, are a model that I fervently hope that the House and Parliament will follow gladly. That will give our young people the best possible opportunity of enjoying the prosperity that our generation has had the luck to enjoy.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) made some good points in his characteristically fair-minded way. I am glad that he has now joined the Council of Europe delegation, as he will be able to bring a further dimension to our deliberations in Strasbourg.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the people of the east —especially those in the dissolving Soviet empire—staying where they are. He said that human rights are probably central to their decisions about location, but I believe that economic benefits and welfare are of equal importance. The British Government could do far more now to assist Mr. Gorbachev economically with the enormous problems facing the Soviet empire. One of our great fears is that the Soviet Union itself will fall asunder, giving rise to enormous instability throughout Europe when we are poised to gain great benefits from Mr. Gorbachev's achievements. There are great political dangers not only for him, but for all of us if we stand aside and say that these are merely the problems of the system and that we shall see how they resolve themselves. We cannot afford to do that and it would be an idle luxury on our part which could drag us down. I hope that Conservative Members will listen carefully to the hon. Member for Mid-Kent and that we shall see more initiatives from the Government in the weeks and months ahead.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to population movement. Many countries in the east will be looking to the united Germany for their own future economic welfare. It has been established that the united Germany has a negative population growth rate; it is also true that the average age there is just under 47. There is obviously a clear capacity for the country to absorb large numbers of eastern European workers, who will be able to share in what will clearly be one of the great economic success stories in the decade ahead. For my part, I have no doubt that a united Germany will succeed economically; but I shall develop that point later.

As the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office made clear when he opened the debate, the unification of Germany has been a remarkable event in what can only be described as a politically most remarkable year. One almost runs out of adjectives to describe the current developments in Europe, and I am sure that we all wish to join the Minister in paying tribute to Mr. Gorbachev for what he has done. His historic role cannot be overestimated.

Marx would have said that it is impossible to judge the political and historical implications of an age when one happens to be living in it; my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) is fond of quoting Chairman Mao, who, when asked what he thought were the implications of the French revolution, replied that it was too early to say. However, even now we can see that Mr. Gorbachev's contribution to the historic process that we are witnessing in Europe is vast and cannot possibly be overestimated.

It is also remarkable that so few people, in this country and elsewhere, anticipated German unification. As politicians we have all been blessed with the benefit of hindsight, and we always employ it shamelessly. Only 12 months ago I was fortunate enough to be on a delegation to the United Nations, and I remember discussing the possibility of German unification with the Soviet ambassador. He said, "Oh no, that is not on; it would not be allowed." I remember asking him, "What if people vote with their feet? You cannot put the tanks in and roll it all back." The process started by Mr. Gorbachev had already gone too far, and there was nothing that the Soviets could do other than accept the developments in the GDR with the greatest grace that they could muster.

[Mr. Tony Banks]

As was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), 12 months ago our own Prime Minister was turning her face against the inevitable—as she does so often with regard to developments in Europe. In a sense, I do not blame her: she did not see what was coming any more than did the politicians of either east or west. Now that it has come, however, we must ensure that we take the maximum advantage of it.

A united Germany will, of course, become a super-state; indeed, it is a super-state already, because of the enormous economic power of West Germany. The 77 million people in the united German economy make it one of the most successful in the world. Certainly it is the only economy in Europe that could have sustained the absorption of a run-down country like the GDR. Imagine the economic consequences for Britain if it tried to absorb such a country, economically and politically: we simply would not have the economic strength.

The figures for the cost of unification seem to be enormous. Of course, they cannot be regarded as wholly accurate; anyone who must provide a range of costs over 10 years running from $550 billion to $700 billion can clearly make only an intelligent guess. But, with the cost of the pollution clean-up in the eastern part of Germany estimated at $140 billion, it is clear that we are talking serious money here. Only one European economy could possibly even contemplate such costs without rushing into blind panic. Certainly, we could not have done it in this country.

When the Minister pointed out the cost to the EEC and to the United Kingdom—my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was concerned to quiz him—we realised that, because of the great contribution that will be made by the West German people to unification, the costs to the EEC and to the United Kingdom are minimal.

One understands that there is a great deal of anti-German sentiment in this country and in the House. I am disappointed that the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley) has not made a much-heralded appearance today. Many hon. Members would have liked to have heard him speak in the unaccustomed position of a Back-Bench Member. Perhaps his speech would have been more considered than his interview in The Spectator. The right hon. Gentleman enunciates something—there is anti-German feeling in this country; there is unease. We cannot really blame the people of this country. The second world war was not that long ago. It is still well within living memory. Many people come to my advice surgery and point out that they fought for this country during the war. They are now asking about what has happened to the successes that we are supposed to have achieved in the past 11 years of Thatcherism. They are asking, "Why haven't I got a decent pension on which to live?" They point to the success of Germany and say, "We are supposed to have defeated Germany in the last war, but it is undoubtedly true that the Germans have won the peace."

Hon. Members always pay attention to the enormous power of the West German mark. Who created the West German mark? It was France, the United States of America and the United Kingdom. We instituted the deutschmark in 1948. It is interesting to see what the exchange rate for the deutschmark was 1948. In 1948 we could have got DM13·4 to the pound. Now in 1990, if we are lucky we can get about DM2·9 to the pound. Over those years our inflation has eroded our wealth, but West German inflation has more or less stayed at about 3 per cent. That is economic success. That is the sort of success that we should want for this country.

The Prime Minister talks about the lessons that Thatcherism has taught the Germans or the rest of eastern Europe. Pardon me for smiling, but that is an absolute farce. I have never known any senior politician to delude herself so often and so regularly as the Prime Minister does with regard to the developments of Europe and the power of the West German economy.

Again referring to anti-German sentiment, one must understand that there is no longer a military threat from the Germans. There is a vast economic threat if we go our separate ways, but there is no military threat. The only thing in my character that I find anti-German at the moment is that, as we all know, they manage to get the best places on the beach first. That also says something about their outlook on life generally. They are more efficient than we are, even when they are on holiday. That is another tribute to them.

Dr. Godman: They get up earlier.

Mr. Banks: They have always been getting up earlier. That is why they have achieved so much economic success. While we are still slumbering in our beds, they are getting the best places on the beach. They are creating the best products that are now flooding our markets. We are finding it very difficult, not to say impossible, to compete economically with them.

There is no doubt that Germany will make unification work. In 10 years—it may be a little longer, but it will be about 10 years—the eastern part of Germany will match the western part of Germany in terms of economic parity. Then we really will face the most formidable economic power on the planet.

I have already mentioned costs. It is interesting to see how the German Government intend to pay the costs. They are vast. I understand that they are prepared to allow the federal budget deficit to grow. Chancellor Kohl has even talked about the necessity, if need be, to raise taxes. One thing about Chancellor Kohl is that he is prepared to face political realities honestly and openly. We would all pay tribute to him for that, despite the fact that Opposition Members do not share his political outlook.

The other aspect of this debate which I want to refer to is the general criticism and condemnation of the old German Democratic Republic. The hon. Member for Mid-Kent referred to Trabants. I accept that Trabants make even Ladas look an attractive proposition. However, the concept was good, although, perhaps, the execution was not so successful. The concept of not having unnecessary competition in an area like motor vehicle manufacture might be something that we will all accept as normal in an advanced world, perhaps in 100 years' time. There will be other more necessary areas of expenditure where such resources will be needed. It does not matter if we are all driving around in cars that look the same if the car is efficient and gets us to our destination. Hon. Members have referred to choice, but when choice is provided only at enormous economic and social cost, that cannot be the kind of choice we want.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. Gentleman is making a theoretically very attractive point. However, modern motor vehicles are more efficient in their use of oil and petrol and also safer to drive than ever before and I believe that that is a direct consequence of manufacturers competing against each other.

Mr. Banks: That does not necessarily follow, but we certainly always want a product to be improved. As I have said, the concept of the Trabant had something to commend it, but we must link concept with execution. I did not mean to spend so much time talking about Trabants. There are many things that I do not want to do in this life and one of them is to become a Trabant salesperson. However, the Trabant was not a bad concept.

The GDR has taken a fair old kicking today. However, not everything in the GDR was worthless. The social guarantees available in the GDR constitution are worthy of comment, as are the welfare benefits and women's rights. I visited the GDR and witnessed the care and attention given to young people in nursery schools and I met a 108-year-old woman in an excellent old people's home. There was no homelessness in the GDR. Perhaps much of the housing was at a level that Members of Parliament would not be prepared to accept, but when I look round my constituency or around London as a whole, I see a lot of people who would be grateful to be driving a Trabant home to an East German flat.

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I visited East Berlin in June. Although the people there were very relieved to be free of the tyranny of the secret police, the quality of the public housing there was far superior to what many of my unfortunate constituents have to endure in Hackney. The women I saw were very concerned about their rights to abortions under the new regime. Not everything about the old GDR was bad.

Mr. Banks: I am grateful that my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott) has joined me in putting that on the record. There has been a tendency in this debate to ignore everything in East Germany, disregard it and say that everything there was rubbish. That is not true. It is important to state that the East Germans will gain a great deal in terms of future prosperity, choice and consumer goods. However, they will also lose something. I hope that disillusionment does not set in too soon.

Unification is good because the German economy is so strong and there is so much homogeneity. The polarisation that exists in this country does not exist there. I believe that they will be able to get a mix which combines the best of the consumerism of western Germany with some of the better aspects of the welfare provision of eastern Germany.

Mr. Spearing: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is vital to get the best of the experience of all nations? My hon. Friend will be aware that York House in Plaistow in Newham, a charity for elderly people which has run since 1925, must now close because the Government will not increase the residential homes allowance. Were old people ever turned out of charitable homes in East Germany?

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend mentions yet more of the benefits of Thatcherism, rather than the sort of arrangements that the people of Germany, East or West, will be prepared to accept. We in this country have a lot to learn from the experiences of East and West Germany. In the end, unification represents a victory for consumerism. Markism has replaced Marxism. The great German mark has been the driving force behind unification.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton said, by the December elections the position will have shaken down in Germany and people will make a cooler judgment of future possibilities and a future direction. If that does not happen then, it will happen at the election after that. The ability to combine the economic efficiency of West Germany with the social justice of certain aspects of East Germany will represent a significant victory for the united German people. I hope that the SPD will win the December elections.

One cannot detract from Chancellor Kohl's achievements. He has achieved a major historic role in all of this and he will be commented on favourably when history comes to be written. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton said, one does not share his political views and outlook, but one approves of his style. I read his comment that Germany does not seek the leading role in Europe, but will live up to her responsibilities. That non-arrogant, diplomatic style contrasts with the shrill narrow tones of the narrow-minded bigot who is temporarily Prime Minister of this country, and makes me realise the great gulf between Great Britain and united Germany. It may be all right for Helmut Kohl to adopt a position of humility and to speak of a united Germany not seeking the leading role, but it will be difficult for Germany to avoid playing the leading role in Europe. The integration of the GDR brings a complexity of special relationships between united Germany and eastern Europe. A unified Germany is undoubtedly pivotal to east-west relations.

The Soviets have now warmly welcomed unification. Vladimir Shenayev, the deputy director of the Soviet Institute of Europe said:

> "We trust Germany. We have a united, democratic Germany that is actively disarming itself. Germany is the Soviet Union's largest trading partner—15 per cent. of foreign trade turnover will go through Germany—more than the United States, Britain and Italy combined."

That is the strength of and power behind the relationship between united Germany and the Soviet Union. We ignore it at our peril.

Mr. Shenayev talked about a unified Germany disarming itself. Because of the fears of many people, not only in this country but in France and elsewhere in Europe, there is an agreement to reduce the combined armed forces from 590,000 to 370,000 over the next four years. We have before us the prospect of 360,000 Soviet troops based in the eastern part of Germany leaving by 1994. That gives us a wonderful opportunity to ensure that we get all our British troops out of a united Germany. I understand that the Government aim to achieve that. I hope that when the Minister replies he will give us a clear assurance and perhaps a date for when British Army of the Rhine forces will be out of a united Germany.

I should like to see a unified Germany declared a nuclear-free zone and all nuclear weapons off German soil. That is another issue which will be raised in the December elections. According to opinion polls, a non-nuclear Germany would find favour with the great majority of German people.

There is now a united Germany standing at the crossroads of Europe with a Moscow-Berlin-Washington axis as the vital one linking east and west. It worries many people that that enormous economic power will act as a gravitational force of irresistible political strength—if there is economic power, there is political power—that that enormous eco-political structure will sit in Europe and its gravitational force will distort economies all around. That worries many people in this country and beyond. The only way that the United Kingdom can influence such an axis, and such economic and political power, is through European institutions—there is no other way.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) might disagree with some of the things I am about to say, but I believe them. In many ways my attitude on Europe has changed in the Gorbachev period. I am right to have changed my position because circumstances have changed so dramatically and for a politician to stand pat on a previous position without attempting to modify it in view of the momentous world changes would mean that he or she would probably be left behind in a major way.

Chancellor Kohl made an interesting statement on French television on Wednesday. Many people thought that the economic problems of unification would mean that enthusiasm for economic and monetary union western Germany would definitely wane. That has not happened. In his statement on television Chancellor Kohl made it quite clear that he agreed with the Dutch proposal that stage 2 could be achieved by January 1994. When the French and Germans agree on something such as that, it means that it will happen. It does not matter what the Prime Minister says, because she is increasingly irrelevant in all of it. I am sure that there will be some welcome among some Conservative Members for what Chancellor Kohl said; I am sure that the deputy Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary will be quite happy about it and, in his quieter and more honest moments—those spent away from the Prime Minister—the Chancellor of the Exchequer will also welcome the news from Germany and Chancellor Kohl's statement.

We cannot stand aside, although some are determined to try to do so. A new club has been announced. I have a document stating:

"Tebbit joins new European club."

That is no recommendation for membership. The document continues:

"The right hon. Member for Chingford is joining with the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury to form a new club."

The club has no name yet but it has been formed to combat the insidious influences of Mr. Delors so perhaps it will be called, "Up yours, Delors" or something like that. It is to be a dining club and I should like to see some of its menus —obviously there will be no sauerkraut or French wines, it will be all bangers and chips. The club is pathetic and will not mean anything.

One of the club's new members, Mr. Alan Sked, said:

"This will be a massive campaign on the issue to drive a wedge between one European country and another."

That is a throwback. There is no way in which this country will stand in the way of economic and monetary union, which is an inevitability and became so as soon as Helmut Kohl and President Mitterrand agreed that it was so.

We cannot live in competition with the deutschmark. The pound sterling cannot survive in competition with the deutschmark, which is the powerhouse of Europe. The only way that we can influence events in a united Germany, whether economic or political events, will be through pan-European institutions. We can survive in an expanding Europe only in junior partnership with the united Germany.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is making a good, serious and important speech, expressing in the latter part of it the views of many of my hon. Friends. However, does not he agree that the basic and fundamental object is not in irrelevant dining clubs—I agree with him—but in not being left behind? The important question is whether we are going ahead in the right direction. There is all the difference between a true co-operative movement in Europe, which my hon. Friend wants—and I want co-operation—and political union which, in the words of the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), means one currency, one nation. Therein lies an enormous danger.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend thinks of it as a danger; I think of it as an exciting prospect. I grant that it is fraught with danger, but nothing momentous can be achieved without an element of danger. What is the hang-up about the nation state? The United Kingdom is made up of constituent countries, which themselves were formed from smaller principalities, kingdoms and states. Notwithstanding what is happening following the immediate break-up of the Soviet empire, the movement is definitely towards a larger Europe. I do not find anything frightening about the idea of a European Government, a European president, a European Prime Minister, a European Chancellor, a European bank and other European democratic institutions such as a European Parliament.

The days of this Parliament are numbered because we are surrendering national sovereignty. This place will become rather like a regional town hall. Those are the developments of the future and I am not frightened of them. I accept that there are dangers and that we should be wary, but it is the way of the future. Obviously, I am not someone given to good judgment, and I could be wrong, but having seen and thought about what is happening, I think that historically it is the way that this country will go. It will have to do so because of the momentous events that have occurred. Without Mr. Gorbachev, none of this would have happened, none of the discussions would have taken place and none of the possibilities would have been available.

My attitude has changed because of Mr. Gorbachev's concept of a common European house—a Europe that stretches from the Atlantic to the Urals. It is such an exciting concept that we must go for broke on it. The opportunity peacefully to redraw the map of Europe for the first time is a gift that former politicians would have given everything to achieve. Some, like Hitler, tried through war, but it did not work. We now have an opportunity to achieve it through peaceful means.

Although I understand the problems, the concept of a federal European state involving both east and west Europe captures the imagination and the mood of the country and beyond. I only wish that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover were here today. I know that I would disappoint him greatly. However, he is an avid reader of Hansard, so no doubt retribution will speedily follow on Monday when he reads my speech. Although I have great respect for my hon. Friend's views—and I do not say that in the hope that he does not totally brutalise me—he is wrong in his view about Europe and the developments currently taking place.

I am afraid that I have spoken for rather longer than I intended, having been diverted by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South, with whom I am sure I will have many opportunities to discuss the issue. For my money, I believe that German unification has given a major boost to the possibility of the greater Europe that I have described, and I wholeheartedly commend it.

Sir Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): It is not often that I agree with the hon. Member for Newham, North West (Mr. Banks), but I agree with him about the role played by Mr. Gorbachev. However, I must also pay tribute—the hon. Gentleman will not agree with me—to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who lit the torch of freedom when she visited Poland. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that not everything in the German Democratic Republic was bad, but I am sure that he will agree that it was an oppressive regime.

Those of us who knew Europe before the last war, and who then saw its artificial break-up as a result of the Yalta conference, would never have believed that its reunification could take place so quickly. Again, we must pay tribute for that to Mr. Gorbachev and my hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Reunification has wide implications—some good, some bad. It will cost a great deal of money, and although there is a great pool of labour in East Germany, its industry has broken down, and it will take about 10 years for everything to be sorted out.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) pointed out that Germany is paying not only for its own reconstruction but for Soviet troops in East Germany to be withdrawn and rehoused in the Soviet Union, wherever the Soviets may choose. That has two advantages. It gets the troops out of Germany quickly, and at a very low price. Rather than pay for them to remain there, it is just as well to get them out of the way altogether. It is a miracle that Germany is able to do that without destroying its own economy. I was worried that, economically, reunification would destroy Germany, but instead it seems likely to become one of the most powerful economic units in Europe.

There is no point in paying tribute to the people who have made reunification possible. Instead, we must ask ourselves what role they are to play in the future. May we expect them to neglect a military role, and instead to spend money on rehabilitating a combined Germany—as was done after the last war? It seems possible that Germany can do the same again.

Shall we stop at Germany, or shall we also welcome into Europe countries such as Czechoslovakia and Hungary? That may be a good idea, with the proviso that those countries attain democracy first. Subject only to that, we should surely welcome them into a united Europe that might eventually include even Russia. There is no reason why that should not happen. There are immense opportunities for a united Europe.

If all that occurs, what are we to do with the NATO troops who would be withdrawn from Europe? Given the experience of the Gulf crisis, the right thing might be to create an international force, so that the resources made available as a consequence of reunification throughout Europe could be used to deal with any situation that arose. It might not even be a NATO force, because NATO, too, might lose some of its significance. Nevertheless, it would be capable of bringing peace to the middle east, the Gulf, South America or anywhere else in the world. However, we must realise that many nations are developing weapons that are not exactly nice—nuclear and chemical weapons. We must retain sufficient nuclear capacity to be able to say to them, "Look here, it's no good your trying this on, because we have a stronger force and you will be wiped out." That argument kept the peace for 40 years and it must be maintained.

No doubt, a strong Germany after reunification will be a strong competitor, but we have to live with the new Germany, accept it and work with it. We must try to get Germany interested, not merely in its own affairs but in world peace. East and West Germany suffered equally in two wars, so that would not be too much to ask now. Germany was built up by America, with the help of other nations. It has survived two wars and it is time that it helped an international force to maintain peace in the rest of the world.

I look towards a united Germany to fulfil that commitment to world peace not merely with weapons and armies but with money. I hope that it will assume such responsibilities when unification is complete, or should I say when reconstruction has finished. I agree that it may take 10 years, but during that time Germany should not neglect its contribution to world peace and it should be reminded of that.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): First, I must declare that I have financial interests that could be affected by German reunification.

To a large extent, German reunification is the result of the drive, wish and initiative of the German people. It is a just and great event and the stage for it was set by Mr. Gorbachev. He did so in response to the great political fortitude shown by the United States, Great Britain and by our NATO allies. He had to meet the fortitude of the western nations with a response, so he issued the world with a new challenge. Unlike most challenges, Mr. Gorbachev's was not that of war but of peace. He proposed to change the nature of peace itself, from one based on deterrence to one based on detente. He swapped the threat of mutual destruction for the opportunity and hope of mutual trust.

Gorbachev's new challenge has successfully removed the Soviet bogeymen from the world strategic map. As a consequence, Mr. Gorbachev has achieved a number of great things.

First, he has heralded the end of the second world war —I find it hard to remember that the two losers of the hot part of that war were Japan and Germany.

Secondly, Mr. Gorbachev has catapulted Europe back into the centre of the world's strategic political stage. but what sort of Europe will it be, and how far will it extend? Will it end in Berlin or in Moscow?

[Mr. John Browne]

Thirdly, Mr. Gorbachev has exposed a great change in the super-power structures of the world. In 1945 Great Britain was replaced as a world super-power by Russia. Today, 45 years later, Russia itself has been replaced as a super-power. The big question is, by whom? Will it be replaced by a new Europe or a new Germany?

On 3 October we saw the birth of a new Germany. Some would say that we also saw the birth of a new German empire—this time, an empire that will be pushed forward not by force of arms, represented by the bayonet, but by economic measures, represented by the deutschmark.

Germany is a very great nation of about 100 million people. Even the Romans failed to conquer the Germanic tribes. Much of the praetorian guard of the Roman emperors consisted of Germans. For centuries the Teutonic knights protected Europe. We have seen Germany take on the might of the world in both industrial and military ways. The German economic miracle, following 1945, was a testimony to the strength and vitality of the German peoples. All this, in my view, portends even greater German growth in the years ahead, as a fully fledged member of the European Community, lying, as it does, adjacent to the vast new markets of central Europe and of the Soviet Union.

Germany has re-emerged as a major national force in Europe and in the world. The vital question for all of us in Europe is how the new Germany can best be assimilated into Europe, in the best interests of Europe in general. It is wrong to think—as, I believe, our French colleagues think—in terms of trying to lock Germany into the EEC. I believe that Germany will not for long be locked into anything. We are, therefore, at a fundamental crossroads in the design of our new Europe.

In essence, there are three major options. The first is the EEC—the European Economic Community of sovereign member states. The second is the EC, as it is now called, or the European Community of a federal European state. The third is a Europe dominated by one single member state.

With such choices, I think that it can truly be said that the times that we now live in are indeed times of legend. Now, we must decide whether Europe will move forward by means of revolution or by means of evolution. At the heart of the answer will lie our policies towards European monetary union.

These are times of great change, of enormous hope and of great uncertainty. One may almost characterise them as the fog of sudden peace. At such a time of uncertainty we are being asked to make a dramatic decision about something that is very dear to all our hearts: the future of our national sovereignty, the future of our way of life.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who is not now in the Chamber, mentioned that we were going to surrender our sovereignty and that we must go for broke. I do not believe that the British people will readily accept that argument. National sovereignty is always a vital and very emotional issue. It is particularly important and emotional when it comes to jobs and the future employment of British people, and it is always important and emotional when it comes to the problem of mass immigration.

I have the privilege of being the rapporteur of the civilian affairs committee of the North Atlantic Assembly. We have carried out some interesting studies in the human rights context both into the problem of the movement of peoples within central Europe as a result of the breakdown of the Soviet empire and into the enormous problems that face Europe with regard to mass immigration, particularly from the Soviet Union, where tens of millions of people may elect to live in the richer, western part of Europe. It is a major problem which must be faced by all EEC members.

I have no doubt that European monetary union is the back door to the creation of a federal European state. European monetary union, as a currency bloc, would effectively be dominated by the deutschmark.

The exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system is a major step towards economic and monetary union and a single European currency. Proponents of the ERM and of European monetary union argue that it would give our economy more financial discipline. Some Labour Members might argue that there is too much financial discipline already.

The ERM and European monetary union are about sovereignty. I say yes to financial disciplines encouraged by economic competition among member states of the EEC, but very definitely no to financial disciplines imposed by a federal European state. The British people will not like it, and furthermore they will not accept it.

Economic domination of Europe by the deutschmark would have major implications for British industry, employment and our way of life.

For decades, following the second world war, our economy almost died. Indeed, today our economy is still in a state of convalescence. It is still prone to relapse into inflation or even stagflation. As it is a convalescent economy, it is the duty of the Government to ensure that our economic health is achieved fully before—I stress "before"—taking on the full unfettered gale of German economic competition. Let there be no doubt that the exchange rate mechanism, leading to European monetary union, will open the gates wide to the full gale force of German economic competition.

We still need time, which is of the greatest importance in continuing to ensure that we achieve economic health and that our economy is strong enough to be able to adapt to the competition that we shall face from Germany—adapt so that Britain will survive and be economically strong. If we enter the exchange rate mechanism and go for monetary union before we are ready, the implications will be serious and damaging for British companies, British industries, British employment and for the British people. We need time for evolution rather than revolution. It is wrong to say that we must go for broke. It is too big a gamble, with the jobs and future way of life of our people at stake.

The speed of our early entry into the European exchange rate mechanism worried me, and it continues to worry me seriously. What particularly worries me is that it appears that the Government were pushed into early membership of the ERM and, therefore, too early down the road to European monetary union and a single European currency dominated by the deutschmark.

As I said earlier, on 3 October we saw not just the birth of a new Germany but the birth of a new super-power. Before it is too late, we must ensure that the financial disciplines that are accepted by our Government as a result of competition in a European Economic Community of sovereign states, a true European common market, do not mean accepting the imposed financial disciplines of a single European currency dominated by the deutschmark.

The key question before us all is how best to assimilate the might of the new Germany in the best interests of Europe in general. I therefore welcome this debate, and I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for calling me.

1.35 pm

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): I do not think that anyone can over-emphasise the importance of this debate and our incredulity at having it; nor do I think that anyone could have envisaged, even a year ago, that we should already have moved to this momentous stage. Like many hon. Members, I have visited both East and West Germany several times. I was fortunate to visit East Germany, just prior to my election to the House, with a number of other individuals who are now my colleagues here. At that time, we would have no truck with the belief that German unification was on the political horizon. The same group went back only three weeks ago to see the incredible changes that have taken place in East Germany. What we saw will remain with us for the rest of our lives. We saw the end of the inhumanity that was the Berlin wall. We saw the change and felt the hope in the air in East Germany and the way that churches which had not been touched since the day they were destroyed by our bombers are being restored. All that is beginning to happen because of the end of the Berlin wall.

It is important to recall that the revolution in the whole of eastern Europe has been achieved largely, with the sad exception of Romania, without bloodshed. It is very different from the revolution that began it—the Bolshevik revolution, which cost 5·5 million Russian lives. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) has left the Chamber. In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), the hon. Gentleman asserted that socialism and communism were not the same. One cannot forget that at the time of the Bolshevik revolution, when Trotsky's armies were in retreat and falling back to Moscow in a last-ditch stand, the British Labour party pushed Lloyd George to abandon Churchill's support for White Russia. At the very time when that revolution could have been stopped, we failed. I am not saying that the Labour party is only to blame but, as much as anyone, it must share some responsibility for the tide of communism that then engulfed so much of the world. There is now an opportunity, as part of German unification and because of the trend of the past few years, to redraw the economic and political map of Europe and, indeed, of parts of Asia. We now have to address the future of Europe as it is affected by German unification.

I was interested to listen to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), and I am sorry that he has left the Chamber. His speeches are often spoilt by too much humour, but this time he obviously made a speech from the heart. Although I did not agree with some aspects, the hon. Gentleman gave an interesting and sound perspective of one way in which the future of Europe could develop.

Several hon. Members referred to the effect on the United Kingdom economy. There are those who believe that the best way to prevent Germany becoming over-dominant is in some way to handicap it. That is no way forward. The way to ensure that Germany does not become over-dominant—let us not forget that it starts with a fairly large handicap because of the immense problems associated with the GDR—is for us to get our act together and for other countries to build their economies into a form by which they can compete effectively with Germany. That is the surest way of having a long-term assurance against over-dominance by any economy.

There is no doubt that the German people want to expunge their past. They would like to strike the history of this century out of the books, which is a highly respectable attitude for them to take. It is reflected in their anxiety to demonstrate their commitment to peace, to democracy and to the rest of the west, and in their determination and enthusiasm for the pursuit of European political union. From their perspective, that is a highly respectable and understandable position. However, despite my respect for them, I believe that we should not all rapidly embrace that perspective.

When I have discussed these matters with some of my German friends, I have found it difficult to accept their unwillingness to look favourably towards a fairly rapid assimilation of the German Democratic Republic's former trading partners in eastern Europe. We must work to assimilate them into the European Community as fast as we can. I know that there are worries about the state of their democracies, but I suggest that this is a chicken and egg problem. Which comes first? Is it a fully stable democracy, or should we assimilate those countries quickly and help them to develop and then stabilise that democracy?

We were quick to take on board Spain, Portugal and Greece as they came out of the grips of one form of dictatorship and I do not see why we cannot repeat that with the countries of eastern Europe. The development of their democracies would be one of the major benefits of their joining the Community and it would also provide them with a great opportunity to develop the capitalist market economy, which is now recognised as the only route to lead to prosperity and to proper care and attention for the environment.

When one sees, as I saw only three weeks ago, some of the incredible environmental problems, with lignite pollution and mile after mile of chemical and gas plants, some of which are unmodernised since the days when they produced Hitler's Zyklon B gas, one can understand the enormity of the challenge, which can be paid for only by the wealth created out of a market economy.

We must not forget that half the population of the GDR does not recall the war. People of my age or younger, born after the second world war, have no memories of anything other than a communist-dominated economy. They have had the wonderful opportunity to rejoin the Federal Republic and to become part of a Germany that is again united. That opportunity does not exist in the same way for the other peoples of eastern Europe, but that does not mean that we should not set out to create a similar opportunity as early as we can.

The papers that we are discussing today deal with the immediate problems, but we need also to deal with the problem of those adjoining nations. The association agreements produced by the Commission in September are a major stepping stone towards European Community membership by Poland, by Hungary, by Czechoslovakia and by the rest. The agreements refer to the approximation of the laws, to the removal of customs barriers and to the free movement of people. They are clearly designed to make the final stage so much easier, although they are not a reason for speeding up the cause of political unity in the European Community.

We must not forget that the Delors proposals were produced at a time when today's debate could not have been foreseen and that they are now outdated. They need to be binned and we must start to think again about how we should now draw the political map of Europe to encourage every nation to be part of a brotherhood that allows economies and national cultures to develop in a way that ensures developing peace and prosperity.

Before we discuss political union any further I want to draw a distinction between political union and what is sometimes lumped together with it—an improvement in the decision-making processes within our present Community. Such a reform is long overdue, but the two things are not the same and should not be confused. We must look to the new economies that are now emerging, and not build further obstacles through political union, which would make their ultimate accession much more difficult to achieve.

I look forward to the day when we can consider similar papers on the terms of membership of the European Community for Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and the rest of eastern Europe. We have assumed —some would say purloined—the title "European Community". Let us look forward to the day when—before the decade is very much older—it becomes truly a European Community.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): There is a peculiarity about this debate: technically, we are discussing documents consisting of masses of empirical detail as well as value judgments, but, more correctly, we are discussing a matter of practical political philosophy. The better speeches, including that of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), have taken an ideological approach. However, they were ideological in a practical sense, because they referred to major developments and concerns. In the limited time available to me, I too wish to adopt that approach.

We should identify what is favourable about developments in both West and East Germany and the west and east as a whole, and thereby draw up plans to ensure that we achieve the right developments both in Germany and on a pan-European scale. What are our worries, and what should we seek to avoid? The various actions that have already been performed have sometimes proved unfortunate, but there are still plenty of opportunities for us to argue the case for acting differently.

What the west had to offer the east, and what West Germany had to offer East Germany, was undoubtedly parliamentary democracy. It was the operation of a voting system, however imperfect some aspects of that system might be. I firmly believe that, in this country, our democratic franchise is being undermined by the operation of the poll tax; I should not wish that tax to be foisted on East Germans as they moved into a new Germany.

I have not made my mind up about proportional representation, but I am aware that the German system is the best alternative on offer. It allows constituency representation; it produces a fair result; and it stops fringe and minority groups from being represented in ways that spoil the operation of the system. It has much to commend it in comparison with other systems, such as that of the single transferable vote in a multi-member constituency: that is not proportional representation, but is merely built on a metaphysical notion of PR. That is vastly superior to the East German "munipulation" of the bureaucratic structures that previously operated.

Democracy depends on more than voting arrangements. This country has recently moved towards a form of elective dictatorship. A full range of civil liberties is required to allow people to organise, demonstrate, express views and understand possible alternatives, and to allow proper checks and balances of the democratic system. The importance of western democracy is not that somebody is appointed to office and has a mandate to do things on behalf of the people; it is that it is always subject to the next election. That fact should influence the attitude and approach of Governments. They should play the game so that they may win on future occasions. At long last, given the unpopularity of this Government, we are beginning to see signs of some moves taking place. People are saying, "They are pinching things out of Labour's programme." That is a healthy arrangement; it should take place in a democracy. There should be to-ing and fro-ing in the market place of politics.

The east had things to offer the west. It had an ideology. Many aspects that were interesting and valuable—they were propounded, although considerably distorted—stressed collective provision and care and sometimes, even despite the bureaucratic arrangements in those societies, fed into policies on full employment and child care and a decent policy on abortion. However, unfavourable things in the west, such as its competitiveness and the capitalist free market, led to exploitation. When the walls were broken down, we saw people stream from the east to the west, but we did not see capital flooding into East Germany and eastern Europe in a way that almost knocked down all opposition.

Conservative Members speak about the value of market capitalism. They should realise that markets do not necessarily have to be capitalist. It is possible to have markets in which social forms of ownership operate and in which competition between co-operatives, for instance, takes place. There are different possibilities from those that are on the cards at the moment.

We have missed a fantastic opportunity to talk about a development in which the best from the west and from the east begins to be drawn together so that improved arrangements can be made in Germany and in Europe generally, and on a pan-European basis. Such insight influenced the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West. I should have loved to have an opportunity to develop those themes.

This is an important debate and it will not go away. It is ideological in the best sense. I hope that other matters are put on the agenda, apart from a rampant movement of markets and capitalism with democracy somehow coming in and making social provision. That influences the current nature of the European Community. What is wrong with the European Community is that markets and capitalism are at the top of the agenda, with democracy, democratic institutions and social arrangements secondary to them. They need to lead the debate, not follow it.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): It is right and appropriate that we should have this debate on German reunification in the first week after the summer recess. As so many hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), have said, German reunification symbolises the most important changes in the world. We must recognise that the changes which have taken place and those that will continue to take place have, to a large degree, been made possible by President Gorbachev taking power in the Soviet Union. We must recognise that he has influenced changes not only in Europe, but throughout the world. For example, he played a behind-the-scenes role leading up to the elections in Namibia last year.

There have been major changes to what most of us have accepted as the norm. For the first time since the war, the United Nations has an opportunity to play a major role and do something that it and the League of Nations between the war years could not do before. There is an opportunity to reduce defence expenditure in the east and the west and to use those resources more positively to the benefit of mankind. On so many occasions the Opposition regret the fact that we still have a Prime Minister and a Government who fail to recognise the opportunities.

In this final decade of the century, the world must deal with poverty and hunger and face our environmental problems. If we can spend as much time and resources on those problems as we have spent on other problems in the past 45 years, they can be solved by the turn of the century. That is the way we should proceed after grasping the new opportunities symbolised by this debate following German reunification.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham North-West (Mr. Banks) correctly referred to the efficiency of the German nation. Despite the problems facing it after the absorption of East Germany, we all accept that Germany will make a success of unification. Reunification will be successful despite the problems which exist in the old GDR.

It is also important to remember that on the Friday of the week in which German reunification took place our Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that we would join the exchange rate mechanism. As has been said, ERM alone cannot solve all our problems.

The hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) and others referred to German industry. The success of German industry has depended on many different factors. The Germans have a far more regional approach than we have. German financial institutions look at industrial investment on a long-term as opposed to a short-term basis. While the people in manufacturing here to whom I have spoken welcome the stability provided by entry to the ERM, they are worried that we have probably entered at too high a price in relation to the deutschmark. They are afraid that that will make our industries uncompetitive and place them at a disadvantage.

Another major difference between our industry and that of our competitors and German industry is that when we talk of pay restraint, work and productivity we always talk about those working on the production line and we do not talk about management in the same terms. I worked in a multi-national company and in a factory before I became a Member of this House. A big difference between our partners in Europe and us is that if managers there expect workers to come in at 8 am or whenever, they do exactly the same themselves. We must set that kind of example. Britain's managers and workers must not oppose each other, but work together to ensure manufacturing output. If we work to that end, we could not only do well, but cure some of our economic problems. I have always been convinced that until the nation gets its manufacturing base right, we cannot cure our economic problems. We must recognise that, and we must have a Government who are prepared to do something about it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) referred to a Select Committee report. We are most appreciative of the efforts of the Select Committee on European Legislation, which my hon. Friend chairs. We must recognise that in a democracy we have people who are prepared to do the detailed work involved in such activity, which is so useful to us. The report makes it clear that major implications for agriculture will arise from German reunification. We must recognise that and deal with it.

The proposed milk quota for the former GDR is 6·8 million tonnes. The direct sales quota is 0·6 million tonnes compared with current annual production of 8·5 million tonnes. There are variants within the figures. The suggested quota for sugar is 870,000 tonnes compared with current production of 670,000 tonnes and a consumption of 800,000 tonnes. The ceiling on intervention purchases of beef would be increased by 15,000 tonnes to 235,000 tonnes. Reunited Germany has the third largest dairy industry in the world, after the Soviet Union and the United States. We must recognise the quota problems of our dairy industry and face them.

Reunification will bring changes which will affect our agriculture and the Government must recognise that. In particular, we must address the difficult areas of farming land where there is no alternative to sheep or dairy farming, especially hill farming. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who is to reply to this debate, represents an area which runs into the Pennines and includes difficult land, although it is perhaps slightly more favourable than that on my side of the Pennines.

If we want farmers who get a small income for their work and effort to remain in agriculture and do not want moorland and bracken to spread, the way in which we use the common agricultural policy and the direction of subsidies must change. Agricultural subsidies are under consideration.

We want a change in agricultural policy which removes much of the nonsense that we have debated so often. The CAP represents the biggest abuse of the Common Market and has engendered much public criticism of the EEC. It costs a family of four £16 per week. We want to change the way in which subsidies are used to advantage and encourage more environmental protection and better use. The agriculture of the former German Democratic Republic gives us cause to be extremely worried because of pesticides, and veterinary medicines and standards, all of which have serious implications.

Environmental pollution has been referred to in the debate. We have all seen the publicity about the environmental problems of the former eastern European countries. We must also recognise that environmental problems are not unique to industry, but exist in agriculture. We must ensure that they are tackled in a positive way.

There is already pressure on fatstock market prices. Before reunification, the prices of many forms of meat were already lower, not only in real terms but in cash terms, than a few years ago, which puts considerable pressure on some farmers. It is clear that unauthorised imports from eastern Europe, coming through Germany, are a major cause of that problem now, and we should be concerned about that. An investigation is to take place into leakage from Poland and Czechoslovakia. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has described the new German border as not tight. However, when the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office opened the debate he said that he hoped that there would not be leakage. I am sure that Ministers will be just as concerned as we are that the agreements that have been reached are enforced and honoured, and nothing extra is allowed through the system that will have an adverse effect on our industry. A high percentage of food to the former GDR now comes from Hungary, Bulgaria and Romania, posing problems that we should consider extremely carefully.

We are in the process of ensuring that the complex harmonisation measures for 1992 which are being debated week after week, are enforced as speedily as possible in relation to the former GDR. The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) said in his speech that it was likely that other former eastern European countries would want to join the European Community at an early date. That is extremely likely. If we look back to the days when borders were taken down between Hungary and Austria, we see that with that first move, the iron curtain no longer existed. The changes that have taken place since the iron curtain was breached were inevitable. That momentum will continue and the other countries will seek membership of the EEC. We must be prepared to face the implications of those changes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) in his speech was not attacking the former east German shipbuilding industry, which is now part of the reunited Germany, but stressing that he wanted the shipbuilding industry of his region to be given the same opportunity to succeed as that overseas. That is the great difference between the two parties at present. The Government's policy is to say that industry can take care of itself, whereas we recognise that Government must take a more positive role if industries such as shipbuilding are to survive. But that does not necessarily mean giving away massive amounts of money. All that we want is to ensure that our shipbuilding industries are given a fair crack of the whip. We want Scotland, Wales and the regions of England to be given a fair opportunity.

The Government do an injustice to the former eastern European countries in criticising their policies. They call them socialist and try to tie the Labour party into the same configuration in an attempt to influence votes at the next election. The Government fail to recognise that a majority Labour Government have been elected several times since the war but have not followed the path of removing democracy and the right of people to change their Government. Indeed, we have criticised the excesses in the way some other countries have been governed. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West said, there were good aspects as well as bad in the way those countries were governed, and it would be wrong to totally ignore the good aspects.

Unification provides both challenges and opportunities. In a rapidly changing world, the Government cannot meet the challenges and therefore will continue to fail to meet the needs of the British people. That is why I am sure that when the Labour party has an opportunity to face the Conservative party at a general election we shall be returned to the Government Benches and the Conservatives will be on the Opposition Benches.

2.10 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): Until the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) made his speech, I thought that agriculture had been the orphan of this gathering, which is an unusual, but, perhaps, not entirely unwelcome phenomenon. He raised a number of agricultural points before diverting to the future prospects of a hypothetical Labour Government, and he joined the revisionist school on eastern Germany. I noted that there were a number of protagonists of the revisionist school. As East Germany is barely cold in the grave, that appears to be a form of political grave robbery. I am sometimes amazed that there was not a mass exodus of West Germans to East Germany to live under the undoubted attractions of that form of Government.

Satisfactory arrangements for agriculture have been made——

Mr. Spearing: Oh!

Mr. Curry: I shall deal with the exceptions in a moment.

The milk production quota for East Germany is considerably below the current level of consumption and there must be a significant reduction. One of the consequences has been a movement of cow cattle into the European market, and that is one of the contributory factors to the difficulties in the beef sector.

The proposed sugar quota of 870,000 tonnes is one that we, together with many other members of the Council regard as too high. Earlier this week, the Commissioner at the Luxembourg Council said that he was willing to reconsider that.

Dr. Godman: Will the Minister give an assurance that, in any negotiations on sugar, he will protect, at all costs, the interests of the African, Caribbean and Pacific cane sugar producing countries in their export of raw cane sugar to the European Community? Such a defence would be compatible with the motion proposed three years ago to defend the ACP countries and the United Kingdom refineries.

Mr. Curry: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will defend the interest of the ACP countries. However, we regard it as part of that interest that prices remain at the same level as those paid in the European Community. The present claim that they should receive a compensatory payment because the EC has started to cut prices is not reasonable.

The maximum guaranteed quantities under the stabilising mechanisms remain the same. East German production does not count against them, but where prices are cut because of the triggering of the stabilisers, that will affect East Germany as well as the remainder of the European Community. There are some minor transitional arrangements for the market regimes, of which we approve.

There are a number of temporary derogations in structures. As in other sectors, we regard them as a sensible means of permitting the former East Germany to be accommodated within the current European system. There are also provisions for the Commission to take minor action where adjustments are necessary. There is always a need for a certain amount of tidying-up. There is also a safeguard clause, under which member states can seek the Commission's intervention if the market has been genuinely disrupted.

The latest estimate of the costs of market support shows that it will increase in 1991 by about 1·3 billion ecu, or £900 million, as a result of German reunification—but even with the inclusion of those costs, the guarantee section for 1991 will be below the guideline, so no adjustment will be needed. However, the budget is becoming fairly stretched and—GATT or no GATT—there will have to be significant changes in agricultural policies starting next year. That is something that member states currently resisting tooth and nail honouring their existing commitments under the GATT negotiation may like to bear in mind.

Given the constituency interests of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), I am sure that he would like me to give more weight to the fishery aspects. I have a close relationship with the German Fisheries Minister, Mr. von Geldern, who has assured me in several meetings that the East German fleet will fish against the West German quota and that no additional quota will operate in respect of East Germany.

The German fleet is now effectively a bigger fleet, but its entitlement remains the same as before, which means that there is no need to adjust total allowable catches or quotas. However, as the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow knows, there is a date on the horizon for a review of the common fisheries policy, when we expect that the Spanish and Portuguese will be the main proponents for change. The East German fleet is large, comprising 76,000 registered tonnes, and is one and a half times the size of the federal republic's fleet—but achieves only 60 per cent. of West Germany's catch.

However, reunification will have consequences for the United Kingdom. In the past, we have always added to our total allowable catch through swaps with West Germany, because we are not necessarily interested in catching the same species. That arrangement has proved advantageous to both countries. It may be that in future the swaps that we once obtained will be taken instead by the East Germans because of underfishing of the German quota. Also, some non-quota species may come under greater pressure, though, as they represent only 1 per cent. of our landings, that is a minor consideration.

There is a genuine question mark over the future of Klondiking. The fleet that used to Klondike might go for the West German quotas, and it is not certain whether the demand for pelagic fish will remain the same, given that prices are no longer at the 1948 levels at which fish was sold in the former East Germay—and the Soviet Union is finding it difficult to raise money to pay for the fish that it obtained from the Klondiking operation. Therefore, the United Kingdom processing industry might find itself with additional quantities of fish available. It is important that it should be able to process it, given the number of Scottish fishermen in particular—but not exclusively so—who depend on Klondiking arrangements. In addition, some third country arrangements will have to be renegotiated by the Community. We shall keep a careful eye on the cost and equity of any arrangements that are made in that respect.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow made a long speech, so I will either make a written response to his other points or will arrange to see him soon, as I recognise his strong constituency interest.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) welcomed the developments in Germany, as did the other speakers, and I am sure that we all subscribe to the general tone of the debate. However, the hon. Gentleman said that the United Kingdom is a passenger in Europe. That is not the case. I invite him to review the series of votes in the European Council over the past year, to see how many times the United Kingdom has been on the receiving end of a minority vote. It is precious few. I might ask him to find out how many times the Federal Republic has been on the receiving end of a minority vote, especially on some of the important financial services regulations. He will find that that has happened on a significant number of ocasions.

The United Kingdom has played a predominant and important role in the European Community on the free movement of capital and the open marketplace. Of course, eastern Europeans look to the generality of successful policies in western Europe, but the United Kingdom experience is one to which they look particularly, as I have learnt when I visited those countries.

I am one of those who are impaled in Brussels now perhaps more than when I was a Member of the European Parliament, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Hamilton will be pleased to hear that. Those of us who do a lot of negotiating in the Council realise that enthusiasm is little substitute for realism. For example, Germany defends her corner very well. I have not the slightest doubt that Herr Keichle is defending his corner on the general agreement on tariffs and trade at this minute in Luxembourg with his customary vigour. He will be taking a stance with which, no doubt, we would be in agreement. It is simplistic, self-destructive and quite simply wrong to attribute to others a virtue which they may not necessarily deserve and to attribute to ourselves a vice which we have rarely demonstrated. The fact of the matter is that we are all in it together. There is a little horse trading but there is nothing wrong with that as it is part of the system and it works.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) told me that he would not be able to be present for the end of the debate. I am glad to pay tribute to the work of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee in this matter. He emphasised the question of eastern Europe and the importance of those countries as potential members of the Community. I hope that we will not be seduced into believing that the debate must necessarily be between people who want to go broader and people who want to go deeper. There are good arguments for the Community to continue with integration while ensuring that that does not preclude further enlargement, when conditions in those countries are right for them to join the European Community.

I beg the House not to forget that there are other parts of the world and other negotiations which matter just as much. For example, EFTA is now engaged in complex negotiations with the Community and it represents a large trading area. New institutional forms are being developed there. Nor should we forget that perhaps now that one of the predominant east-west issues has been settled, the north-south issue, and the role of the developing countries, is a matter to which we should also devote a considerable amount of our attention.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford asked a specific question about the immediate cost to the United Kingdom. There has been no demand for an increase in the 1990 budget. We estimate the net cost to the United Kingdom in the 1991 budget at £32 million, and in 1992 at £59 million. It is worth remembering that Germany will remain overwhelmingly the largest contributor to the European Community budget. As the former East Germany grows in prosperity, the tax take contributed to the Community might be expected to increase.

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): I am not quite clear how those figures tie up with those given in the answer to the Treasury Select Committee's report yesterday. I certainly would not want the Minister to take those figures as an amount that we would not seek to negotiate downwards; otherwise we shall be paying a substantial sum towards German reunification.

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend will know that the United Kingdom Treasury—I hasten to add that I do not speak for the Treasury on this occasion—has rarely been averse to trying to negotiate figures downwards. I shall certainly check up on the matter that he has raised, and ensure that he receives a response.

Again I pay tribute to the work of the Scrutiny Committee under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). As a Minister I am frequently on the receiving end of its work, and I do a lot of work upstairs in Committee. The new system, which will be introduced, with the approval of the House, in the new Session, will no doubt multiply my work. The Committee's work is clearly difficult, given the problems of monitoring European legislation. The hon. Gentleman asked a specific question on the gross cost of unification. The Commission's estimate, as it stands, is for commitments of 2·125 billion ecu in 1991, and 2·285 billion ecu in 1992. The United Kingdom's estimate is marginally below that level for commitments and is about 2·512 billion ecu for 1992. The increase in German contributions is estimated at 1·4 million ecu in 1991 and just under 1·3 million ecu in 1992.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) referred to the height at which aeroplanes can fly to Berlin. There has been an increase, but there is a limitation that is linked to the probable presence of Soviet troops in the former East Germany until 1994. The German authorities are now responsible for the height at which aeroplanes can fly.

I pay tribute to the Council of Europe's role as a staging post for eastern European countries in their eventual move towards integration with western Europe. It is an important role. We must not overlook the fact that the European Community has set certain criteria relating to democracy and the nature of society which must be fulfilled before states are eligible to join the Community. We must maintain those criteria. Therefore, the Council of Europe has an extremely important role to play in that respect.

I have replied to the question put to me by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow about fisheries. He also asked me about shipbuilding. Current proposals suggest a higher level of aid, for two years only, to allow for the restructuring of yards. That aid can be given only on the basis of a clear structure plan. It is open to us to ask the Commission to investigate the matter if we think that contracts have not been subjected to the correct competitive procedures. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry would take up with alacrity any evidence that suggested to the contrary.

The hon. Gentleman referred specifically to Caledonian MacBrayne. I understand that Ferguson is already building two ferries for Caledonian MacBrayne. That contract was awarded without Government assistance because the company did not need it. I am told, however, that aid would be available from the shipbuilding intervention fund for that purpose.

As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, a new commitment amounting to 3 billion ecu for the structural fund has been proposed by the Commission. The United Kingdom entitlement remains the same. From 1994 onwards the structural fund will be revised. I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern. I shall ensure that it is conveyed to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, as the Minister who is most directly involved with the social fund.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) drew attention to minorities in eastern Europe. It was a useful addition to the debate. We tend to forget that eastern Europe has had a particularly chequered history. The 20th century history of eastern European countries has hardly been one of unmitigated peace and light. There have been many problems and squabbles, not least territorial squabbles. Therefore, it is as well to remember that in all those countries there are victims of territorial squabbles.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) who inaugurated the revisionist view of East Germany—a view which its inhabitants do not appear to share- is nostalgic about the command system. His nostalgia is touching. As for his attraction to the Trabant, which I do not wish to figure too largely in these debates, that depends on whether one is in front of or behind that car, given the amount of pollution that it emits.

I subscribe to the praise of Mr. Gorbachev that has been voiced by many hon. Members. However, I ask the House to maintain a sense of perspective. We ought to give a little praise to those western countries, and the United States, that held firm over defence throughout the years, thus allowing conditions to be created that led to Mr. Gorbachev being faced with choices. The choice that he has adopted, to disengage the Soviet empire, would not have been open to him had it not been for the resolution of the west in defence matters since the end of the second world war. We should therefore be slightly more generous with the distribution of our praise. Nevertheless, the choice that he has made for the Soviet Union, which appears to be in major difficulties, is courageous.

My hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Sir A. Glyn) apoligised for the fact that he could not stay until the end of the debate. I accept his point about the importance of the next stage in Europe and his view that Germany will be both our competitor and our colleague. It is hoped that Germany will eventually feel that she is able to assume wider responsibilities in the world without compromising her firm resolve that she should put her history behind her and continue on a peaceful course. I foresee no reason why that should present a dilemma for the German Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) praised the role of Mr. Gorbachev. He spoke of Germany's power being directed in a commercial way, which is exactly what will happen. However, there is no reason for West Germany to mop up the whole of eastern Europe. Its markets are available to all of us. I visited eastern Europe and very much hope that British companies will be active in seeking its investments.

The debate has been important. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) invented the expression "munipulation", which I assume are the actions of left-wing Labour councils. It is important that we should welcome what has happened in Germany. It is a major achievement for the west, for democracy, and for peace. All of us will benefit, and I commend the motion to the House.

Question put:—

The House divided: Ayes 47, Noes 2.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. COM (90) 400 on transitional measures consequent upon German unification and 8782/90 on revision of the Community's financial perspective in the light of German unification; and endorses the Government's approach to these negotiations.

SELECT COMMITTEES RELATED TO GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Ordered,

That—

(1) with effect from the beginning of the next Session of Parliament, Standing Order No. 130 (Select committees related to government departments) be amended by leaving out in the Table:

'10. Social Services	Department of Health and Social Security	11 3'

and inserting therein:

' . Health	Department of Health	11 3', and
' . Social Security	Department of Social Security	11 3'; and

(2) it be an Instruction to the Social Services Committee to lay upon the Table of the House before the end of the present Session of Parliament such Minutes of Evidence taken before it and Memoranda laid before it and not previously reported as may fall within the respective orders of reference of the proposed Committees.—[Sir George Young.]

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 24th October, if proceedings on the Motions in the name of Sir Geoffrey Howe relating to Procedure, Questions to Members Etc., European Standing Committees, Select Committee on European Legislation and European Community Legislation have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at Seven O'clock put the Question already proposed from the Chair, and, if that Question is for the amendment of the Motion then under consideration, then put forthwith the Questions on any other Amendments thereto which he may have selected and which may then be moved and then the Main Question or the Main Question, as amended, and shall then put forthwith with successively the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on any further such Motions as may then be made, including the Questions on any Amendments thereto which he may have selected and which may then be moved. —[Sir George Young.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS (SERVICES)

Ordered,

That Mr. David Lightbown be discharged from the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services) and Sir George Young be added to the Committee.—[Sir George Young.]

Beaver Estate, Hounslow

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Sir George Young.]

2.41 pm

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): I am grateful for this opportunity to discuss the future of the Beaver estate in Hounslow. It gives me great pleasure in doing so to be able to welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) to the Front Bench and to give him my best wishes for his work there.

In 1967, the Greater London council bought the leasehold interest in the Beaver Farm estate, Hounslow and proceeded to build 631 dwellings on the site. In designing the estate, the architects sought to avoid the mistakes made in previous GLC estates. They set out to ensure that the estate would not be like any other GLC estate. It was to be low-rise, spacious and green, and laid out and managed as if it were a private estate. There were five acres of open space, and hundreds of mature trees and saplings. By 1972, most of the dwellings were occupied.

In 1973, the GLC assigned its lease to a housing association, the United Housing Association Trust, for £4·5 million and agreed to cover the deficit between the rental income, and the running costs and mortgage payments for 15 years. As a result of mergers, the housing association eventually became the United Kingdom Housing Trust.

The method of construction used for building the estate was known as Bison wallframe, which involved the use of pre-formed slabs. By March 1973, it was found that 393 out of the 631 dwellings were suffering from dampness. In many cases, the roofs, walls and windows were not properly keeping out the rain. The bathrooms and bedrooms were cold due to an inadequate heating system.

In 1983 and 1984, consultants recommended the renewal of the roofs and the bolting of the concrete panels. Subsequently, a pilot project was launched to renew the roofs of six blocks, with the aid of a GLC grant. In 1985, it was found that all types of dwelling on the estate contained asbestos, which was potentially dangerous—and, if disturbed, would certainly be so.

Although 17 years have passed since the first surveyors' reports were carried out in 1973, many of the dwellings still suffer from dampness. The condition is severe in a number of the properties whose roofs were renewed as part of the pilot project. Large amounts of asbestos remain unremoved.

The tenants believe that, if their properties are to be restored to a decent standard, it is not enough to provide new or additional roofs and bolt the concrete panels. They believe that the leaking windows should be replaced, the asbestos should be removed, new, adequate central heating should be provided and the interiors should be refurbished. The Beaver Estate Tenants Action Association, set up in November 1983, has a committee of 15, which has done an immense amount of work on the tenants' behalf. In a recent report, the committee said:

> "In view of all the surveys that have been done on this estate over the last 19 years, the future would be no different from the past as far as the inside of our homes is concerned unless the United Kingdom Housing Trust or others can afford to remove the asbestos, replace the windows and refurbish to a decent standard the inside of our homes."

A recent consultants' report indicates that the necessary internal work to the dwellings will cost at least £7 million over seven years.

Over the years, there has been no shortage of consultants' reports, but the amount of money required to bring the estate up to a satisfactory standard has never been available.

The method of construction was not the only problem that confronted the estate. The landlord's lease contained a clause under which the ground rent could be reviewed every 10 years. In 1967 the ground rent was set at £32,500. In 1977 it was increased to £96,000. In 1987, the freeholder's valuer contended that the rent payable according to the rent review formula would be £1·2 million, and it was evident from the advice received by the housing association that the rent fixed by the arbitrator would not fall far short of that figure.

The United Kingdom Housing Trust made it clear that it was unable to afford to pay more than a few instalments of the new ground rent. Moreover, it faced further increases at 10-yearly intervals. The housing association therefore faced the prospect of liquidation and forfeiture of its lease, while the tenants faced the prospect of losing their security of tenure and becoming assured tenants of another landlord.

Faced with that crisis, the Housing Corporation provided the United Kingdom Housing Trust with a £5 million grant. The United Kingdom Housing Trust agreed to borrow £12·4 million from a merchant bank, and a further £2 million from a public company, to enable it to buy the freehold and initiate a repairs programme. In order to be able to repay the banks, the housing association drew up a programme of intended sales of vacant dwellings on the estate, and embarked on a pilot sales project.

No properties on the estate have yet been sold, and the United Kingdom Housing Trust is unable to pay the interest or make the repayments that are due in respect of the loan from the merchant bank. Its position has been transformed from inability to pay the rent to inability to pay the mortgage.

I have been involved with the Beaver estate since 1983; during that period, the relationship between landlords and tenants has been generally unsatisfactory, and at times very bad. For much of the time there has been an atmosphere of distrust and a severe loss of confidence on the part of the tenants.

The tenants have also been concerned that, under the housing legislation passed since 1980, although the estate started as a council estate and has subsequently been owned by a housing association, they have not been entitled to buy their homes because the United Kingdom Housing Trust was a charitable housing association. Moreover, those tenants who moved away were not entitled to the cash discounts that were subsequently introduced for housing association tenants who did not have the right to buy because no housing association grant had been paid in respect of the construction of the estate.

Nevertheless, over the past year some progress has been made. Following an angry meeting of tenants, which I attended, and representations that I made to the landlords and the Housing Corporation, a Beaver estate working group was set up in which the landlords and the tenants consulted each other regarding building work and repairs to be carried out on the estate. That group has done useful work. The United Kingdom Housing Trust has agreed also to sell properties to tenants at a discount even though they have no statutory right to buy.

From that brief history of the experience of the Beaver estate so far, I believe that three important points emerge.

First, the combination of the structural problems caused by the Bison wallframe method of construction and the financial effects created by the rent review clause in the ground lease, which led to the "rescue" package, make the Beaver estate an exceptional problem for the voluntary housing association movement, which calls for an exceptional solution.

Secondly, the unusual experience of the tenants of that estate points to the need to review housing association tenants' rights in respect of security, the right to buy, and cash discounts.

Thirdly, the failure of the pilot project and the pending change of ownership of the estate make this the right moment for the new landlord, the Housing Corporation, and the Department of the Environment to review the future of the Beaver estate.

The tenants have been informed that the UKHT is to be merged with the North British Housing Association.

Neither I nor the tenants have heard anything but good of the North British Housing Association, and its appearance on the scene in place of the UKHT is certainly a source of encouragement. However, the tenants are concerned at the virtually total lack of consultation that has taken place regarding the proposed change of ownership. That again contrasts with the position of council estate tenants who are faced with the possibility of a change of ownership of the estate. A meeting has taken place between the tenants' representatives and the chief executive of North British Housing Association. It was evident that North British was far from fully informed about issues affecting the estate.

When they asked what funds North British would have to carry out the remedial work needed, the tenants were told that North British would seek funds from the Housing Corporation to carry out the necessary repairs and that the merger would give the Housing Corporation more options for allocating funding to the estate for improvements, but that priorities for expenditure would be determined by the local authority. That sounded to the tenants very like the discussions that have been taking place for the past 17 years.

The cost of the outstanding remedial work on the estate and of bringing the interiors up to a decent standard is very substantial. A recent consultants' report showed that the rebuilding of the whole estate in brick on existing foundations would cost about £20 million, and many of the tenants feel that a phased rebuilding programme in brick, starting with the most defective housing, is a solution that must receive serious consideration. If such a solution produces readily mortgageable and lettable dwellings, that may in the long run provide the soundest proposition for the estate.

With the proposed transfer of ownership, it is important that attention should be focused on the future of the estate. I urge that four steps should be taken.

First, where there is a proposal to change the ownership of an estate from one housing association to another landlord, the Secretary of State and the Housing Corporation should use all their influence to ensure that there is full consultation beforehand between the new landlord and the tenants' representatives, which should cover all issues of policy and practice relevant to the estate.

Secondly, in the case of the Beaver estate, that should include the question of transfers, sales at a discount and the future of the Beaver estate working group. It should include a full up-to-date analysis of the structural problems of the dwellings on the estate and discussions between the new landlords and the tenants to achieve an agreed plan of remedial action that will face up to all the defects in the properties and make a realistic estimate of the cost of refurbishing the dwellings to a decent standard. If a realistic assessment shows that a phased rebuilding in brick on the existing foundations appears to be the right solution for parts of the estate, that is an option that should be followed.

Thirdly, the tenants, the new landlords and the Housing Corporation need an assurance that the necessary funding will be available to carry out the remedial work and repay the loans that were incurred to the banks to buy the freehold in 1989. The failure to remedy the defects in the estate has now continued for 17 years and I believe that the time has now come when those defects must be tackled effectively and with the necessary resources.

Fourthly, I believe that the experience of the tenants of the Beaver estate shows that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment should review the rights of housing association tenants with regard to security, right to buy and cash discounts. There is a strong case for the view that security should depend on the relationship between landlord and tenant and not on a change in the personality of the landlord and for the view that, with regard to the right to buy, tenants of different sorts of housing associations should be treated in the same way.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues at the Department of the Environment will make it their business to ensure that these four steps are taken. The voluntary housing association movement plays an important role in Government housing policy. I believe that those steps are important not only for the future of the Beaver estate, but for the credibility of the voluntary housing association movement.

2.56 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robert Key): First, I congratulate my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) on securing this Adjournment debate and thank him very much for his kind words. It is entirely appropriate and in keeping with my approach to politics that my maiden appearances are made in an empty Chamber. I recall that my maiden speech in 1983 was made at precisely 6 pm on a Thursday evening when the entire parliamentary Conservative party was at a meeting of the 1922 Committee. However, that means that we can concentrate on quality rather than quantity, and that is what I want to do.

I am grateful for this opportunity to lay out the background to this particular problem and to make some comments of a more general nature about the voluntary housing sector. My predecessors have taken a close interest in the welfare of the Beaver housing estate and I intend to maintain that interest. Of course, it does not fall to the Government to intervene directly in housing association management which is the statutory role of the Housing Corporation. However, this case throughout its turbulent history has illustrated the importance of, first, the supervisory and monitoring role of the Housing Corporation over registered housing associations and, secondly, the participation of the tenants themselves.

The good work of the tenants' association has rightly been commended. The residents have remained committed to a single principle, in their own words,

"to try and create a better place for all the residents to live, not just for today but for the future".

How right they are. The Government are committed to promoting meaningful tenant participation throughout the subsidised rented sector. The Beaver estate tenants are pursuing the ideal of participation which the Government recognise and for which, in the shape of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston, they have found a worthy champion.

The background to this case spans 23 complicated years. I thank my hon. and learned Friend for leading us so clearly through that history, which is no easy matter. The two fundamental difficulties that were to plague the management of the estate existed from the outset, when it was developed by the Greater London council. When the GLC purchased the leasehold interest in 1967 it accepted a ground rent review clause with a width of scope that was later to prove an intolerable burden for the estate. The GLC also chose to build the housing using the Bison wallframe construction method—an industrial building method of the time which used pre-formed slab construction. As the years have gone by, there have been severe problems—including, as my hon. and learned Friend said, rain penetration of the flat roofs, weakness in the concrete panels, the presence of asbestos, and condensation. Thus, when the United Housing Associations Trust—later the United Kingdom Housing Trust—took over the leasehold interest, those difficulties had already been created, even if the effects were not at that stage apparent.

The construction defects came to notice in the early 1980s, but it was in 1987 that the future of the Beaver estate tenants was thrown into serious jeopardy. The second 10-yearly ground rent review saw the freeholders seeking an annual payment of £1·2 million—30 times greater than the original 1967 rent charge. It was at that stage that the Housing Corporation demonstrated both a watchful eye and considerable flexibility. It felt able to provide £5 million to UKHT in grant to enable UKHT to relieve the burden of the rent review clause by acquiring the freehold. That was an exceptional decision, made in response to the exceptional circumstances of the case. The corporation's prime commitment for its development programme is to provide additional low-cost housing. Yet it took the broad view and accepted that UKHT would be meeting an urgent housing need. In this case, even if no new units would be forthcoming, it decided to proceed. Thus the money was supplied and UKHT carried out the transaction, aided by a loan facility of some £12·4 million supplied by a consortium of bankers.

It was unfortunate that no one at that stage could foresee the cash flow problems that were subsequently to hit UKHT. It is true that it was by no means the only organisation to be caught off guard by changing conditions in the housing market. Unfortunately, UKHT had considered that grant support of £5 million would suffice and at that time the Housing Corporation was in no position to provide further funding. I know that criticism has been levelled at UKHT and even at the corporation, but perhaps today we should concentrate on the tenacity and determination of the corporation and UKHT in trying to find the best solution available to tackle the enormous problems posed by the Beaver development.

One of the major statutory functions of the Housing Corporation is the monitoring and supervision of registered housing associations. The securing of high standards of performance by associations is one of its key strategies in the overall task of working with voluntary housing bodies to provide good homes for those in housing need.

On top of a sound monitoring and supervision framework, the corporation has developed systems for associations to improve their performance, most notably through the published performance expectations. They work in conjuction with the tenants' guarantee which lays down the minimum standards of housing management expected by the corporation. It is also a major benchmark for tenants to consider whether they are being given a fair deal. Two of the key principles of the guarantee are that associations should consult and involve tenants in major maintenance decisions and management changes, and that there should be a regular flow of information between landlord and tenant. I have noted my hon. and learned Friend's remarks about the tenants' views on consultation in this particular case.

The Housing Corporation used its statutory powers and its knowledge of the situation to confirm North British Housing Association as the right partner for UKHT in order to secure the future of the Beaver estate. UKHT considered various options before identifying North British Housing Association as a potential partner. The corporation was concerned to safeguard both the interests of the tenants and the earlier injection of public funds. Knowing the robust financial position of North British, the corporation was content with UKHT's decision. Thus, UKHT has now become a charitable subsidiary of North British. There has been no transfer of landlord. The tenants retain the same tenancy status as they did before.

That brings us to the crux of the matter for the tenants. What does the merger hold for them? My hon. and learned Friend has raised several of their anxieties and uncertainties and I now wish to address some of them.

First, is North British fully aware of what it has taken on, and when will the tenants see proposals designed to tackle the estate's problems? Here there is no doubt that the tenants have made their points very clearly, notably at an important joint meeting held on 18 September. Having said that, I am sure that North British, for its part, appreciates the special problems of Beaver estate but wants to avoid making any guarantees lightly. I am sure that the Beaver tenants have felt let down enough times during all the years to appreciate the association's reticence. However, one clear principle has been cited—a guarantee that UKHT tenants will enjoy at the minimum, the same quality of service as they received in the past. That is a baseline and a fair one on which to build.

The rescue package put together when the freehold was purchased included about £6 million for structural and external improvements to bring the properties up to a mortgageable standard. The first of two phases of that is due to be completed shortly. That programme was heavily reliant from the start on a programme of sales which, for the market reasons already mentioned, did not materialise. That sales programme is still required, now to be backed by a substantial sales and marketing campaign, and I hope that it will command the active support of the existing tenants. The important difference now is that North British can provide financial underpinning of UKHT should there be any shortfall in the sales programme.

It is estimated that a further £7 million is required for internal improvements of the dwellings. North British will be seeking major repairs funding from the Housing Corporation to help finance that, as my hon. and learned Friend said. Obviously, it is not certain that that funding will be provided and it is not for my Department to become involved in individual investment decisions when it is the corporation's responsibility to manage a very complex development programme. However, the corporation was fully supportive of the merger and it has been prepared to consider major repair proposals carefully and on their merits.

In short, I think that the tenants will need to be a little patient with North British in terms of detailed proposals. There is no point in the association rushing into schemes that prove not to be viable. North British merged with UKHT as a matter of some urgency. It must now be given a little breathing space to evaluate the options for dealing with the problems it has taken on. I know that it has assigned to its UKHT subsidiary the task of undertaking a thorough review of all options for the estate before any further major decisions are made. I know that the tenants tend to favour the phased redevelopment of the estate using traditional brick building methods. If that is a viable option, I am sure that it will be carefully considered.

One specific grievance that some of the tenants hold, and to which my hon. and learned Friend alluded, is that as UKHT is a charitable association, they have no statutory right to buy their homes. The Government have tried on a number of occasions to give secure tenants of charitable associations that right, only for the proposal to be rejected in another place. However, our commitment to helping people purchase their own homes remains and there are alternative schemes designed to help such tenants into low-cost home ownership. For example, the tenants' incentive scheme is designed to enable associations to offer grants to assist their tenants to move out and buy homes of their own. At the same time, that releases vacancies for reletting to homeless families and others in housing need. There are also shared ownership initiatives and self-build schemes available.

Some tenants are also aggrieved that UKHT is offering to sell homes voluntarily, but at discount prices below those allowed under right-to-buy provisions. I am afraid that it is not for me to try to influence the levels of discount. Those were determined by the association in the light of legal and valuation advice and considered defensible under the constraints of charity law.

Let me turn finally to a quite proper tenant concern that I raised at the start of my reply—their right to be informed and consulted. I must say straight away that I was delighted when I heard that North British was to become involved with the Beaver estate tenants. Its track record for working alongside tenants is admirable and I am aware that communications with the Beaver estate tenants are already open and expanding. On 11 September the North British director of finance and UKHT's regional director met four members of the Tenants Action Association. A week later, as I have already said, the chief executives of both North British and UKHT met the Tenants Action Association and members of Hounslow council. The tenants were able to give a presentation of the history of the association and to fire a full range of questions at the chief executives. I gather that they received a full range of considerably detailed responses, and I am sure that that is only the beginning of the partnership.

With the strong reinforcement from North British now in place, I believe that the Beaver estate tenants can look to the future with some confidence. North British is one of the leading associations in the country, with 25,000 homes in management. It is renowned for the quality and responsiveness of its service to tenants. Both the association and the corporation are determined to work constructively with the tenants. I realise that the tenants themselves are still somewhat ill at ease. As I have said, that is not surprising considering the many years of frustration and grievances that they have suffered. After all, the estate was designed to be different, to be better, to be more open and to be more green. In the end that has, sadly, gone wrong.

After the turbulence that the tenants have experienced, I am not surprised that they are ill at ease. Let us hope that they will now put aside any scepticism and enter into a positive partnership with North British, working constructively to provide a new period of security for the Beaver estate.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at ten minutes past Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 23 July 1990

CIVIL SERVICE

Trade Unions

101. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met representatives of the civil service unions to discuss working conditions.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Morale

102. Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what plans he has to improve morale within the civil service.

Mr. Luce: Maintaining good morale is an important policy for all involved in the management of the civil service. The next steps initiative will provide many opportunities to engage the enthusiasm and talents of staff.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Manufacturing

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the manufacturing sector productivity growth for each European Community country on the nearest comparable basis for the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Following are the relevant data.

Average annual percentage growth of Labour Productivity in Manufacturing

	1986-89
United Kingdom	5·2
Germany	2·3
France	4·9
Italy	[1]4·8
Belgium	n/a
Netherlands	−1·2
Spain	1·2

[1] The figure for Italy is for 1986-88.
Sources: OECD Main Economic Indicators
OECD Quarterly Labour Force Statistics
CSO Economic Trends.

Of the major EC countries for which data are available, the United Kingdom has had the fastest growth of labour productivity in manufacturing since 1986. Reliable data for other EC countries are not available.

International Monetary Fund

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the board of the International Monetary Fund will next discuss International Monetary Fund assistance to Vietnam.

Mr. Ryder: Vietnam is in arrears to the IMF and in 1985 was declared ineligible for further loans while these arrears persist. The IMF board regularly reviews Vietnam's ineligibility, most recently on 12 March.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the reasons for the deterioration in the balance of trade in manufactures since 1985.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 18 July 1990]: The balance of trade in manufactures deteriorated because United Kingdom demand for consumer and, especially, investment goods, grew faster than industry's capacity to meet it. The excess was met by imports. But the strong investment growth of the last three years will add to domestic capacity and enable British industry to meet more domestic and foreign demand. Industry has already exploited export opportunities. Indeed, in 1989, exports of manufactures, excluding erratic items, increased by 11 per cent., the fastest annual rate since 1973, and in the latest three months they rose by 14 per cent. Increased capacity, along with tight monetary policy continuing to restrain the growth of domestic demand, will provide the right conditions for an improvement in the balance of trade in manufactures.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment has been made of the reasons for the deterioration in the balance of trade with the United States in manufactures since 1987; and whether he will publish a table showing imports and exports of manufactures less erratics to the United States of America in 1987, 1988, 1989 and this year to date.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 18 July 1990]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today about the balance of trade in manufactures as a whole. The information requested is not available. Trade in manufactures including the erratic items is, however, readily available in the House of Commons Library in Business Monitors MA20 (annual data) and MM20 (monthly data), published by the Central Statistical Office.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the gross output of manufacturing industry other than food and fuel excluding inter-industry transfers within the sector as defined in 1973, 1979 and the latest available year.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 18 July 1990]: Current price information on the gross output of each manufacturing industry is published annually in Business Monitor PA1002, report on the census of production summary volume. Copies of this volume up to 1987, the latest available year, are available from the House of Commons Library.

The value of the transfer of goods between industries is not separately identified in the census, but guidance on the sales by manufacturing industries to other sectors can be obtained from the input-output tables for the United Kingdom. These have been published for 1974, 1979 and 1984 and are available in the House of Commons Library.

Gilts

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his most up-to-date estimate of the level of gilts sales in the final quarter of the current (a) calendar year and (b) financial year.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 19 July 1990]: It is not the Government's practice to provide the information requested.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his most up-to-date estimate of the public sector borrowing requirement in the current financial year.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 19 July 1990]: The most up-to-date estimate of the public sector borrowing requirement in the current financial year is £6·5 billion, covering the outturn for April to June. The Budget forecast for the public sector borrowing requirement in 1990-91 as a whole is minus £6·9 billion, that is, a net repayment.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Stretford, 2 February, Official Report, column 375, on minimum wage effects, what estimates have been made of the relationship between employment and wages using the current version of the Treasury model; and what estimates have been obtained using alternative economic models.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 20 July 1990]: Most economic models, including the current version of the Treasury model, show that slower growth of real wages will raise employment in the long run.

It has not, since 1978, been the practice to run particular simulations on the Treasury model to meet specific outside requests; but the hon. Member will be aware that the current version of the model is available for Members' use through the Library.

Diplomatic Properties (Rates Arrears)

Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many European Community countries are in rates arrears for diplomatic properties in London; what are the respective amounts involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 20 July 1990]: The Rating of Government Property Department collects the beneficial portion of the rates on properties occupied by diplomats. The following members of the European Communities have arrears outstanding in respect of claims made to date

France	91,856·89
Portugal	2,031·34

The Rating of Government Property Department and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office regularly approach countries that are in arrears and urge them to make payment.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Know-how Funds

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) whether further education level initiatives qualify for know-how fund initiatives;

(2) what funding the British Council is receiving in order to fund further education college level initiatives in Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

Mrs. Chalker: Under the know-how-fund, the British Council has been asked to manage programmes of academic links between British and Hungarian and Czechoslovakian institutions. The annual level for funding for each country is currently set at £100,000. Colleges of further education can submit proposals for consideration under these schemes, which also operate in Poland, where the annual level of funding is £150,000.

Overseas Aid

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of gross domestic product Government support for overseas aid made up in 1989-90; and what are the estimates for 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mrs. Chalker: The proportion of United Kingdom gross national product devoted to official development assistance in 1989 was 0·31 per cent. Estimates for future years are not available.

Cambodia

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Government will now give Government-to-Government aid to Cambodia.

Mrs. Chalker: We welcome America's decision to ease the flow of private humanitarian assistance to Cambodia. Britain has been building up its humanitarian aid since November 1989, by providing support for the activities of British NCOs and international agencies. Direct Government-to-Government aid is ruled out as we have no official dealings with the Hun Sen regime.

Colonial Service Pensioners

Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the actual cost of public funds of the concession awarding war service credit to colonial service pensioners for the financial year 1989-90; and what is the estimated cost for 1990-91.

Mrs. Chalker: The additional cost of pensions attributable to the concession to grant credit for war service to colonial service pensioners was approximately £1·8 million in 1989-90 and is estimated at £3·3 million for 1990-91. Expenditure was lower in 1989-90 because a substantial number of those eligible chose to forgo the payment for the period April to December 1989 in exchange for an addition to their contingent widow's entitlement.

PRIME MINISTER

Marine Life

Mr. Morley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement outlining the mechanisms for, and extent of, co-operation between the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in respect of research into the long-term effects of dredging on marine life.

The Prime Minister: The Department of the Environment co-ordinates the comments of Government Departments on applications for licences issued by the Crown Estate Commission to extract aggregates from the sea bed. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food provides comments on applications in respect of the potential impact of extraction on the fishing industry and on the marine environment.

Research into effects of aggregate dredging on the sea bed is conducted by the Ministry, which has recently decided to undertake a further programme of research in this area. The work will be part-funded by the Crown Estate Commission. The Ministry will draw on the results of this research in commenting to the Department on extraction policy and on dredging applications.

Child Benefit

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Prime Minister whether the views expressed in her written answer on child benefit given to the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) on 17 March 1981, Official Report, column 55, remain her policy.

The Prime Minister: The Government's policy on child benefit remains as set out in our last manifesto. As I have said on many occasions we stand by that commitment.

Colin Wallace

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer of 2 July, Official Report, column 413, when she expects a reply to be sent on her behalf to Colin Wallace's letter of 10 June about alleged links between Charles Haughey and the IRA.

The Prime Minister: A reply has been sent on my behalf.

SCOTLAND

Radioactive Discharges

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the volume and nature of radioactive discharges into the Firth of Forth from (a) Torness power station and (b) Rosyth royal dockyard; and what arrangements are made for monitoring and recording such discharges and any residues in the marine environment.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Details of the quantity of waste discharged and of the environmental monitoring undertaken and of the results obtained are published in a series of bulletins issued by the Scottish Development Department. These are available in the Library.

The operators are required, as a condition of the authorisation, to sample and analyse all discharges, to keep records and to send a copy of the records to Her Majestys' industrial pollution inspectorate. Check samples of the liquid waste are periodically taken on behalf of the Inspectorate and analysed.

A condition of the authorisation is that environmental monitoring as specified by the Secretary of State must be undertaken by the operator. To provide an independent check on the operators results a separate sampling and analyses programme is undertaken by the inspectorate. The Torness nuclear power station authorisation relates to dscharges of liquid waste into the North sea.

Mental Welfare Commission

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the nominating bodies for the four new commissioners appointed to the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland on 1 May and for the three reappointments to the commission.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Under section 2(5) of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984, my right hon. and learned Friend, before making recommendations to Her Majesty the Queen for appointment to the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland, is required to consult such bodies as appear to him to be concerned. These bodies are invited to nominate suitable candidates and any names put forward are considered along with other possible candidates. The final recommendations submitted to Her Majesty are solely a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend.

Nurses (Bridging Course)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Government intend to allocate additional funds to increase the number of available places on the bridging course for nurses.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Health boards are already in receipt of additional funding for Project 2000 purposes and are free to decide how much of that money should be spent on bridging and conversion courses for enrolled nurses.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the ratio of enrolled nurses applying to undertake the registered general nursing bridging course and the number of available places on the bridging course in Grampian.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: As at May 1990, the latest date for which figures are available, the ratio of applicants to places was 15:1. Work is in hand to increase the rate of enrolled nurse conversion generally.

Broadleaved Woodland

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is in a position to announce the outcome of the review of the Government's present policy for broadleaved woodland.

Mr. Rifkind: The Government's policy for broadleaved woodland was announced on 24 July 1985 in a statement to the House by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) at columns 557-62. The main objective of the policy was described in the statement as being "to maintain and enhance the value of Britain's broadleaved woodland for timber production, landscape, recreation and nature conservation".

The statement also listed a number of complementary aims which would involve the planting of more broadleaved trees and the better management of broadleaved woodlands to serve a range of needs.

Several new measures designed to achieve the policy aims were introduced or foreshadowed by the 1985 statement, such as the preparation of Forestry Commission guidelines on the management appropriate to various types of broadleaved woodland; a substantial reduction in the volume of timber—both broadleaved and conifer—that could be felled without a licence, directed mainly at arresting the depletion of ancient woodlands; and the introduction of a broadleaved woodland grant scheme designed to assist in the rehabilitation of neglected woodland and to encourage the creation of new multi-purpose broadleaved woods. The main features of the broadleaved woodland grant scheme were incorporated in the woodland grant scheme following our decision to remove forestry from the scope of income tax and corporation tax in 1988.

In the 1985 announcement we stated that the operation and effectiveness of the new measures would be reviewed after some three years. That review was put in hand in October 1988. As a first stage, information was assembled by the Forestry Commission on the progress achieved against the aims and measures set out in 1985 and presented in a report entitled "Broadleaved Policy—Progress 1985-1988". Copies of the report were sent to more than 600 individuals and organisations for comment. A great many helpful and constructive replies were received by the summer of 1989, and the Forestry Commission then held bilateral discussions with the Nature Conservancy Council, the Countryside Commissions, Timber Growers United Kingdom, the Country Landowners Association, the Institute of Chartered Foresters, the National Farmers Union and Wildlife Link. We are also indebted to the Agriculture Committee of this House for the observations it made on this topic in its report issued earlier this year "Land Use and Forestry"—HC 16-1.

What became immediately clear from the review was the very considerable success that the policy has had in extending the area of broadleaves throughout the country. In 1984-85, some 9 per cent. of grant-aided planting by private owners was with broadleaves; by 1988-89 this had risen to around 17 per cent. The policy has also been successful in arresting the loss of broadleaved woodland and in focusing attention on the irreplaceable contribution that the semi-natural woodlands make to our environment.

A number of bodies saw a need for further increases in the broadleaved planting grants. The Government have considered the case for this with care, but, against the background of the considerable expansion in broadleaved planting that has taken place since 1985 and the substantial rise in grant rates which occurred with the introduction of the woodland grant scheme in 1988, we have concluded that there is no evidence that the grants on offer have been inadequate. The Government will, however, keep the rates of grant under review.

The most important single issue to emerge from the broadleaves policy review, however, and one which was shared by the broad spectrum of forestry and environmental interests consulted, relates to the need to encourage good multi-purpose management of the various types of broadleaved woodland. Concern over this issue has been highlighted by the decision taken in the 1988 Budget to remove tax reliefs on woodland management expenditure, although transitional provisions were introduced for these reliefs to continue for existing woodland owners until April 1993.

The comments received on this issue have related not only to the costs of managing broadleaved woodlands over the very long period between establishment and the first returns from the sale of timber, and of bringing neglected woodlands back into production, but to the lack of the necessary incentives to encourage owners to adopt practices that would have environmental benefit over and above normal maintenance work. Particular concern has been expressed by a number of bodies that owners are not receiving the special help required to enable them to meet the more exacting multi-purpose objectives and the associated higher costs of managing ancient semi-natural woodlands.

The Government accepts that more needs to be done to ensure the better management of our broadleaved woodlands in the future, to encourage owners to bring neglected woodlands into a healthy and productive state, and to provide owners with the necessary incentives to maintain and improve the environmental value of their woodlands. We have therefore decided to make woodland management grants available under the Forestry Commission's woodland grant scheme. In the light of the changes to the forestry tax arrangements and the considerable scope which exists to improve the environmental value of all types of woodland, we have further decided that woodland management grants will be made available for conifer as well as broadleaved and mixed woodlands.

To qualify for the new grants, woodland owners will be required to agree to a five-year plan of operations with the Forestry Commission which will set out the management objectives for the woodland and prescribe operations which will advance those objectives during the period of the plan. The grants will be paid annually in arrears subject to satisfactory implementation of the plan. A lump sum payment of £100 will also be available from the Forestry Commission for owners who draw up management plans for the first time with the benefit of professional advice for areas eligible for the woodland management grants. This assistance will not be available, however, for planting plans.

There will be two types of woodland management grant:—

(a) standard management grants, which will be payable during the normal maintenance period following the initial establishment phase of the woodland—for conifer woodlands between 11 and 20 years of age and for broadleaved woodlands between 11 and 40 years. In return for these grants owners will be obliged not only to carry out normal silvicultural operations to a high standard but also to take such steps as may be agreed between them and the Forestry Commission to increase the environmental value of the woodlands;

(b) special management grants, which will be payable for woodlands of special environmental value of any age above 10 years. In return for these grants, the owner will be required to agree to take specified action which will maintain and enhance the woodland's special character. Woodlands in this category will be those which in the Forestry Commission's view are of special value for nature conservation, landscape, public recreation or a combination of these by virtue of their nature, location or use. There will be a presumption that conifer and broadleaved woodlands properly classified as ancient and semi-natural on the inventory being drawn up by the Nature Conservancy Council will qualify, as will those of special landscape value in national parks, areas of outstanding natural beauty and national scenic areas or which are covered by woodland tree preservation orders, but each case will, of course, have to be considered on its merits. Any woodland, whether or not in a nationally designated area, may qualify if the owner has proposals to establish, develop or improve free facilities for public access or for public recreation in the woodland, provided the proposals are in keeping with public demand for such facilities and are accepted by the Forestry Commission. Owners in receipt of this special management grant will not be eligible to claim the standard management grant in respect of the same area.

A supplementary grant will be paid for woodlands of less than 10 hectares in either of the above categories in recognition of the higher management costs involved.

Woodlands which are currently in receipt of grants from other public bodies will not be eligible for the woodland management grant, except for those established under the farm woodland scheme. The annual payments to farmers under that scheme are compensation for agricultural income forgone, and are not provided for the purpose of defraying maintenance expenditure.

The rates of woodland management grant and their periods of eligibility are given in the following table.

Subject to clearance by the European Commission under the terms of article 93 of the treaty of Rome, this significant extension to the woodland grant scheme will come into operation on 1 April 1992, with the first grants being paid in 1993-94. It is estimated that the annual cost of the new grants will be of the order of £5 million once the system has built up; this will be found by the Forestry Commission from within existing resources.

The commission will be issuing detailed guidance on the management grants early next year, to enable woodland owners to put the preparation of management plans in hand. Some woodland owners are able to claim tax relief on the cost of managing their woodlands under the transitional taxation arrangements that will continue until April 1993, but tax relief for 1992-93 will not be available on woodlands for which management grants are received for that year.

Turning to other features of the review, it is clear that the guidelines for the management of broadleaved woodland prepared by the Forestry Commission in 1985 have generally served their purpose well. It was advanced, however, by a significant number of commentators that the guidelines were not being interpreted by all the parties concerned with sufficient sensitivity to regional or local variations. The Government are clear that the guidelines must not be treated as hard and fast rules, but should be interpreted flexibly enough to enable appropriate local and regional factors which affect woodland management to be taken into account. We have asked the Forestry Commission to ensure that this is done.

Under the present provisions of the woodland grant scheme, planting grants are paid for the initial establishment of new coppice stools but only on the basis of traditional coppice rotations. We have decided that this is unnecessarily restrictive and the Forestry Commission will be introducing an amendment to the scheme so that the establishment of short rotation coppice will be eligible for planting grants, subject of course to the silvicultural and environmental conditions of the scheme being met. Coppice woodland can have particularly high conservation value if managed in a traditional way and will be eligible for the woodland management grant provided that the other conditions are met.

A number of bodies thought that increased provision should be made for open spaces in determining the areas eligible for Forestry Commission planting grants. In administering the woodland grant scheme the commission is already fully aware of the value of open ground and the associated edge habitats for reasons of landscape, nature conservation, recreation and game management. There can be no question of planting grants being paid on large areas left unplanted. We have, however, asked the commission to continue to adopt a flexible approach, particularly where a modest amount of open space over and above what is normally required for roads and rides would bring significant benefits to the woodland environment.

We are very conscious of the cost and difficulties of growing some species of broadleaves in those areas where populations of grey squirrel are high. The review has indicated that the setting up of grey squirrel control groups has met with only limited success. We have asked the Forestry Commission to persevere with these initiatives since co-operative effort is essential. In areas vulnerable to grey squirrels, prescriptions for their control will be an obligatory part of the approved management plan on which grant will be paid.

In our recent response to the Agriculture Committee's report "Land Use and Forestry", we agreed that Coed Cymru was a useful illustration of the effective integration of advisory services which had been successful in delivering advice to woodland owners. We have asked the Forestry Commission to consider encouraging parallel projects as one of the important means of providing an effective advisory service elsewhere in Britain. The Forestry Commission will also seek to increase the help which its own foresters can give, particularly in the co-ordination of advice, the training of advisers and the better marketing of the produce from broadleaved woods.

The Government are grateful to all those who contributed so constructively to this review of broadleaves policy, and we are sure that the decision to introduce woodland management grants will be particularly welcomed by both forestry and environmental interests. The policy we introduced in 1985 has proved to be soundly based and has already had a significant impact on British forestry. With the changes I have announced, we are well placed to continue with the important task of conserving and enhancing the value of our woodland heritage.

Woodland management grants: Grant rates effective from 1 April 1992

Type of grant	Period of eligibility (age of wood in years)	Rate of grant (£ per ha per annum)
Standard Management Grant
Conifer	11-20	10
Broadleaved	11-40	25
Special Management Grant	11 onwards	35
Supplement for small woods
Standard: Conifer	(as for main grant)	5
Broadleaved	(as for main grant)	10
Special grant	(as for main grant)	10

Note: Mixed woodlands will be eligible for the broadleaved and conifer element of the grant in proportion to the area occupied by the two categories.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Security

Mr. Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cope: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 19 July 1990 to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) at column 1162.

Trade Union Law

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to bring trade union law in Northern Ireland into line with that in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: It is my intention to bring forward a proposal for legislation in Northern Ireland which will reflect the provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984 and the industrial relations provision of the Employment Acts 1988 and 1989. The application to Northern Ireland of provisions equivalent to those in the current Employment Bill will be considered in due course following discussions with interested bodies.

Stevens Inquiry

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects any trials arising out of the Stevens inquiry to begin.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 3 July 1990]: Eleven persons interviewed by the Stevens team have so far been brought before a court. Other investigation files have also been submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland by the police. His directions are awaited.

Offences

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were charged with (a) non-scheduled offences, and (b) scheduled offences; and how many persons were found not guilty of all or some of the offences with which they were charged in 1989.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 4 July 1990]: Information in the precise form requested is not readily available. However, the number of persons proceeded against in Northern Ireland courts during 1989 for non-scheduled offences totalled 42,800 of which 3,153 were found not guilty; 456 people were proceeded against for scheduled offences of whom 42 were found not guilty.

Security Forces

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give (a) the number of incidents where security forces in Northern Ireland opened fire on vehicles taken without their owner's consent and (b) the number of (i) persons injured and (ii) persons killed, in such incidents separately, for 1987, 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 4 July 1990]: The following table details the number of incidents where the security forces in Northern Ireland opened fire at either stolen, hijacked or suspect vehicles, and the number of injuries arising from such incidents.

Year	Number of incidents	Injuries
1988	15	3
1989	26	19

No deaths have occurred as a result of these incidents.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many formal complaints have been made about incidents of police use of plastic baton rounds in 1989; in how many cases the complaint has been upheld; and in how many cases disciplinary action has been taken against the officers involved.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 4 July 1990]: During 1989, seven complaints were made concerning the use of plastic baton rounds by the Royal Ulster Constabulary. One case was subsequently withdrawn. Three cases have been investigated and files forwarded to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who directed no prosecution in each case. No disciplinary action has been recommended in any of these cases. The other three cases are at present under investigation.

Sexual Offences

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many men in Northern Ireland were convicted of the offences of procuring or attempting to procure the commission of acts of buggery and gross indecency in each of the years 1980 to 1989, inclusive.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 6 July 1990]: I am advised by the Chief Constable that information is not available in the form requested. However the following figures are available from 1986 which the hon. Member may find helpful.

Convictions for	1986	1987	1988	1989
Soliciting by males	—	—	—	1
Gross indecency[1]	19	7	20	19
Indecent assault on a male	9	10	20	15

[1] Includes buggery.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General how many subject access requests under the terms of the Data Protection Act his Department has received; what was his estimate of the number of requests that would be received; what consideration he is giving to the subject access fee charged by his Department as a result; and whether he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: There have been no subject access requests under the terms of the Data Protection Act in respect of data held by the legal secretariat to the Law Officers, the Treasury Solicitor's Department or the Serious Fraud Office. The Crown prosecution service has received seven subject access requests. I had estimated that the number of requests would be low and I have at present no plans to introduce a subject access fee.

Bereavement Damages

Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Attorney-General (1) if he will name the individuals or organisations who replied to his consultation paper on bereavement damages and who are in favour of (a) increasing the limit to (i) £5,000 and (ii) £10,000 or (b) leaving the limit unchanged;

(2) if he will make a statement on his evaluation of the responses to his consultation paper on bereavement damages before the summer recess.

The Attorney-General: The Government are not yet ready to make a statement, but will do so as soon as possible.

Child Abduction

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Attorney-General what steps the Lord Chancellor's Department is taking to prevent child abduction to the Isle of Man.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor's Department is working with other Departments and the Isle of Man authorities to extend to the Isle of Man the Hague convention on the civil aspects of international child abduction and the European convention on recognition and enforcement of decisions concerning custody of children and on restoration of custody of children, and to provide for the reciprocal enforcement of orders between the Isle of Man and the United Kingdom in the same circumstances that currently allow enforcement between the three United Kingdom jurisdictions under part I of the Family Law Act 1986. Criminal sanctions already exist in relation to abductions from England and Wales to the Isle of Man.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Attorney-General how many children have been abducted to the Isle of Man by a parent during each of the last five years.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor's Department does not hold any information as to the number of children abducted by a parent to the Isle of Man, as the Child Abduction and Custody Act 1985 does not extend to the Isle of Man.

Social Security Commissioners

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Attorney-General what is the estimated cost of extending legal aid to cover representation of claimants at social security commissioners' hearings.

The Attorney-General: The current estimate of the cost of extending legal aid to cover representation of claimants at social security commissioners' hearings is £300,000. This figure, however, assumes that the remuneration rates will be the same as those for matrimonial proceedings, that 90 per cent. of claimants will receive legal aid, that barristers will not be instructed and that hearings will be on average two hours long. None of these assumptions may prove to be correct.

In addition, this figure assumes that the number of appeals would not increase if legal aid were to become available, which is unlikely to be the case. These additional resources may therefore be available only if savings can be made from elsewhere in the legal aid scheme.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Attorney-General whether he will make arrangements for representation at social security commissioners' hearings of claimants who would otherwise be unrepresented.

The Attorney-General: In line with my answer to the hon. Member on 16 July about legal aid for representation at Social Security Commissioners' hearings, my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor has no current plans for the representation of appellants to the commissioners, because the necessary additional resources cannot be provided at present.

Laurence Rosen

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Attorney-General whether, in the light of documentary evidence, the confession of an accessory, and information supplied by persons both in the United Kingdom and abroad, criminal proceedings relating to the fraudulent misappropriation of funds will now be instituted against Mr. Laurence Rosen; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No. The position with this case remains as I explained to my hon. Friend in my letter to him of 3 July. Both the senior Crown prosecutor responsible for the case and counsel instructed to advise the Crown prosecution service consider that the available admissible evidence is insufficient to justify criminal proceedings against Mr. Rosen consistently with the code for Crown prosecutors. I am satisfied that that view is correct.

Divorce Law

Mr. Janner: To ask the Attorney-General when he expects to receive the report of the Law Commission in respect of divorce law reform.

The Attorney-General: The Law Commission is expected to publish its report on the reform of the law of divorce in the autumn of this year.

TRANSPORT

MV Marine

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will establish an inquiry into all the circumstances surrounding the ownership, management and loss of the MV Marine;

(2) when he received the report by the Bahamian authorities on the loss of the MV Marine; what consideration he has given to its conclusions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The report of the investigation by the Bahamian authorities into the loss of MV Marine was received by the marine accident investigation branch on 29 May. Following his initial consideration of the report the chief inspector raised certain questions with the Bahamas, to which answers have now been received. We shall, in addition, be asking them to publish and expanded report which more fully reflects the depth of their investigation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will decide whether any further inquiry is required when review of the Bahamian response is completed.

Unroadworthy Vehicles

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about the number of vehicles in use that have been constructed from two or more written-off vehicles.

Mr. Atkins: This information is not available. Many vehicles written off by insurance companies are capable of satisfactory repair, including the use of parts from other accident-damaged vehicles. If rebuilding work is not carried out properly, there are offences of using, offering for sale and selling an unroadworthy vehicle. A prospective purchaser is well advised to have a second-hand vehicle inspected by an independent expert before buying it.

Vehicle Purchase

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the Director General of Fair Trading about measures required to protect potential purchasers of unroadworthy vehicles; and if he plans to seek changes to the law in this field.

Mr. Atkins: The Director General has suggested that we strengthen that part of the Road Traffic Act 1988 which makes it an offence to sell unroadworthy vehicles. We have told him we propose to amend the Act at the earliest legislative opportunity.

He has also supported the trading standards officers' request for powers to inspect used cars on dealers' premises. This requires special expertise and we have pointed out that these powers are already available to authorised examiners, including examiners from the vehicle inspectorate. The vehicle inspectorate is keen to respond to any requests from individual trading standards officers.

Parking Management, Cologne

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will initiate an urgent study of the parking management system used in Cologne, with regard to the applicability of a similar system in major British towns and cities.

Mr. Atkins: We are already aware of the Cologne system which uses a comprehensive arrangement of variable signs to inform drivers which city car parks have space available. Comparable systems are already in operation in various towns and cities in Britain.

A1 Roadworks

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he is making to ensure that, in respect of any tenanted farmhouse occupied by a working farmer which will require to be demolished for the construction of the A1 Marshall Meadows improvement north of Berwick-upon-Tweed, an alternative farmhouse can be provided on the affected holding.

Mr. Atkins: Matters of compensation relating to this proposed road improvement are currently being discussed and considered by the district valuer and objectors' representatives.

Dial-a-Ride

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the numbers using Dial-a-Ride during each of the past five years.

Mr. Freeman: Information on the number of members of London Dial-a-Ride and the number of journeys made by them in each of the last five financial years is as follows:

	Members	Journeys
1985-86	37,000	307,000
1986-87	47,734	416,000
1987-88	51,009	463,000
1988-89	63,263	544,000
1989-90	66,301	622,000

In 1990-91 it is estimated that over 70,000 members will make 690,000 journeys.

Newly Qualified Drivers

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce an identification scheme for newly qualified drivers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: None as yet.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to restrict the engine size of cars driven by drivers within 12 months of passing their driving test; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 27 June to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs), column 211.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of the total number of private motor vehicle drivers were involved in (a) fatal, and (b) non-fatal accidents within 12 months of passing their driving test for each of the last three years.

Mr. Atkins: Information is not collected in the form requested, but research studies show that young and inexperienced drivers have a much higher accident rate than mature drivers.

Driving Licences

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many drivers obtained their private motor vehicle driving licence for each of the last three years.

Mr. Atkins: The number of drivers who obtained their first provisional or full private motor vehicle driving licence for each of the last three years is as follows:

	Provisional (learner) licences	Full licences
1987-88	1,167,630	750,165
1988-89	1,142,005	722,850
1989-90	1,157,532	890,611

Roads (Legislation)

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he is yet in a position to announce the introduction of legislation to implement the proposals in "The Road User and the Law".

Mr. Atkins: We have said we shall do so at the earliest legislative opportunity.

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what administrative action has been taken so far to implement proposals contained in "The Road User and the Law".

Mr. Atkins: Further to the answer I gave my hon. Friend on 10 May, Vol. 172, col. 215, responses to the consultation papers on drivers' physical fitness and rehabilitation are now being considered. A feasibility study on enhanced data linkages between the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency and the police national computer has recently been completed. In the light of its recommendations, work is now in hand to achieve police access to driver records. This will provide a valuable aid to improved enforcement of road traffic law.

Traffic in London

Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he has made on the proposals in "Traffic in London", which he announced he was going to pursue on 27 March.

Mr. Parkinson: My announcement on 27 March followed successful public consultation on the broad proposals set out in "Traffic in London" on 14 December. I have today published a consultation document on the results of the more detailed work necessary for the legislative processes on those initiatives. I hope that everyone concerned will consider the contents carefully and make any observations on them by the due date of 28 September. I have placed copies in the Library.

Microlights

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to make it compulsory for microlight pilots to be insured at least for third party risks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. Friend has received, in response to a request to the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority, initial advice from the authority on the issues which would have to be dealt with by a compulsory third party insurance scheme for civil aviation including microlights, and he is now considering that advice.

Truck Stops

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what help has been given by his Department to truck-stops situated beside motorways and major trunk roads regarding signing to allow them to attract service from motorways and trunk roads and compete with motorway service areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: On motorways, the general policy is to sign only motorway service areas, but signs to truckstops and other off-route facilities will be allowed in special circumstances, in particular where there is no service area within a reasonable distance. There are overriding road safety reasons for limiting the numbers of signs to be read by motorway users, and operators of off-route facilities can identify conveniently the junctions to use for reaching them by quoting their number in their publicity material.

On other roads, signs to truckstops are acceptable subject to criteria relating to safety and the nature of services on offer. Advice on these criteria has been made available to local highway authorities which also have a discretion to allow signing to local destinations.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the provision of services for truck drivers as defined under section 115 of the Highways Act 1980 in the United Kingdom and similar provision in France and other European countries.

Mr. Atkins: Except in Northern Ireland, which has a limited length of motorway, our aim on motorways is to ensure that service areas are available at which all motorway users can rest and obtain fuel and refreshments without leaving the motorway. The parking areas and associated facilities at these sites are designed to meet demands from all roads users, including lorry drivers.

For other trunk roads the policy is to rely primarily on private initiative to provide facilities to meet needs. In areas, however, where there are clear deficiencies of services we are encouraging joint action with local highway authorities to identify sites for comprehensive provision of services.

Her Majesty's Government have no responsibility for service provision in other European countries. It is understood that the arrangements vary considerably from country to country. In France, however, and other western European countries the initiative to provide facilities lies largely with the private sector within the framework of control by highway and other authorities.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the specialist facilities as laid down by section 115 of the Highways Act 1980 for lorry traffic are provided for lorry drivers by highway authorities in the United Kingdom; and how many have been provided by the private sector.

Mr. Atkins: Information is not available on the total number of facilities provided by highway authorities and the private sector respectively. Needs on motorways are catered for by motorway service areas.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department has taken to improve the specialist services for commercial vehicle drivers on Britain's motorways and major trunk roads, as suggested by the Prior committee.

Mr. Atkins: The Prior committee was concerned with motorway service areas (MSAs) only. At such areas we now encourage operators, where feasible, to allow for overnight (as well as daytime) parking of lorries. Almost all operators now permit this. At new MSAs we require provision of showers and shaver points, and encourage provision of separate catering facilities for lorry drivers. Where MSAs are modernised, we invite operators to make similar provision.

On other trunk roads, the policy is to rely primarily on private initiative to provide the facilities needed. However, the Department has discussed with both the local authority associations and representatives of the main oil companies and caterers the need for local joint planning exercises to identify suitable sites. The guidance note attached to the Department's circular roads 4/88 on "The Control of Development on Trunk Roads", issued in November 1988, sets out advice on the desirability of establishing a comprehensive range of services including fuel, refreshments, toilets and parking facilities, together with parking for heavy goods vehicles, at intervals of between 12 and 25 miles.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what specialist facilities for commercial vehicles are provided at the new Thurrock motorway service area.

Mr. Atkins: The full basic range of services is available now at Thurrock MSA to all motorway users. Catering is being provided from temporary buildings pending completion of permanent facilities. When the main amenity building is completed in 1991, there will be a separate dining area for drivers of commercial vehicles and separate shower, shaving and toilet facilities.

Motorway Service Areas

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the planned motorway service areas have been built; and what reasons he has identified for the delay between the opening of the M25 and the opening of motorway service areas.

Mr. Atkins: Of the 59 motorway service areas (MSAs) planned by the Department, 43 are built and operating. In addition Thurrock MSA is in operation but with catering provided in temporary buildings. The main amenity building will be completed in 1991; the rest of the development is finished.

On the M25 we intend to provide four MSAs. Services at South Mimms and Thurrock are open. At Clacket Lane, near Westerham, progress had been delayed by public inquiry and High Court proceedings, but we expect to seek tenders for a developer-operator shortly. M25 widening proposals caused us to abandon our plan to provide services at Iver. We are looking again at how best to provide services on that part of the motorway.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the current motorway service areas on the M25 will be able to cope with the increased traffic arising from the opening of the channel tunnel.

Mr. Atkins: All motorway service areas are designed to cope with forecast traffic levels for the stretch of motorway served. We are continuing to assess the need for additional MSAs or expansion of existing ones following the announcement of the increased road building programme detailed in the "Roads for Prosperity" White Paper and the publication of the new national road traffic forecasts last year. On the M25 there are four MSAs planned, two of which are now open. We will keep under review the need for additional services on the M25.

M25 (Thames Crossings)

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the past and forecast commercial vehicle traffic figures for the M25 through the Dartford tunnel and across the Dartford river crossing for the years 1987 to 2007.

Mr. Atkins: The actual and estimated figures as provided by Dartford River Crossing Ltd.—the crossing operators—for commercial vehicles using the Dartford-Thurrock crossing are as follows:

	Light 000's	Heavy 000's	Total 000's
1987	4,070	2,670	6,740
1988	4,470	2,960	7,430
1989	4,520	3,240	7,760
1990	4,860	3,200	8,060
1991	5,050	3,320	8,370
1992	5,300	3,490	8,790
1993	5,450	3,590	9,040
1994	5,600	3,680	9,280
1995	4,730	3,110	7,840
2000	5,360	3,530	8,890
2005	5,940	3,910	9,850
2010	6,510	4,280	10,790

These assume that the east London river crossing will be open by 1995, with consequential effects on traffic using the Dartford-Thurrock crossing.

Whitechapel Road, London

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve the flow of traffic along Whitechapel road, London E1.

Mr. Atkins: I have no plans to improve the traffic flow on Whitechapel road since this is a local authority road and the responsibility of the London borough of Tower Hamlets.

Pedestrian Crossings

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has further to improve pedestrian safety at pedestrian crossings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: My Department looks continually at ways of improving pedestrian safety at crossings. We are researching improved techniques for identifying sites where crossings would improve safety. In June we announced the trial of a new type of audible signal to help blind people using staggered pelican crossings. We are currently testing a new type of crossing incorporating pedestrian detectors which will improve the safety of those who need longer to cross, while minimising traffic delay. Initial responses from groups representing pedestrians and disabled people have been favourable.

London Underground (Safety)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 3 July, Official Report, column 496, what action he intends to take in respect of authorities which have restricted traffic on busy routes across London Underground passenger transport lines in order to repair these routes and remove any future danger of bridge collapse.

Mr. Atkins: It is the responsibility of each highway authority to determine what action to take if a structure is found to fail the criteria set out in departmental standard BD 21/84.

My Department has set up a working group including representatives from the London boroughs, London Underground Ltd., British Rail, the British Waterways Board and the Metropolitan police, whose terms of reference are to co-ordinate the work of assessing and strengthening road carrying structures in London by highway authorities and structure owners to achieve a programme of optimum priority, and to ensure minimum disruption to London's transportation systems.

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with representatives of British Rail and London Underground regarding the incident at Waterloo station on 3 July involving a potentially dangerous build-up of passengers; what evaluation he has made of the explanation provided; and what plans he has to pursue the matter further.

Mr. Freeman: An officer of the railway inspectorate has discussed with British Rail (BR) and London Underground Ltd. (LUL) both the cause of the incident and possible means of improving passenger movement at Waterloo. I understand that a direct telephone line has now been installed between BR and LUL operations rooms at Waterloo and, in the longer term, a joint operations room will be established. BR will also be installing closed circuit TV to monitor subways and escalators in the peak hours.

The inspector will be submitting a full report on this incident and on subsequent action taken by the operators, to the chief inspecting officer railways. He will consider in due course whether any further action is necessary.

Dock Workers

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the number of registered dock workers now employed for each appropriate port.

Mr. McLoughlin: With the abolition of the dock labour scheme in July 1989, there ceased to be any register of dock workers, so this information is not available.

A27

Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether, following the ministerial visit on 31 January and the meeting between his Department's Dorking office and representatives of West Sussex county council on 5 July, he will indicate the prospects for adopting the modified orange route for the A27 Arundel bypass which would move the alignment of this route in a more southerly direction.

Mr. Atkins: Further investigation of the alternative modified orange route for the proposed Arundel bypass is needed before my right hon. Friend decides whether to amend the preferred route. A further announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Staff Based Abroad

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list, with details of their grades and duties, those staff from his Department and the Civil Aviation Authority, based abroad.

Mr. McLoughlin: Fifteen members of staff from my Department are at present based abroad. One grade 5 and two grade 7s are seconded to the European Commission in Brussels as detached national experts, and another grade 5 is the United Kingdom representative to the Council of International Civil Aviation Organisation in Montreal. Three officers at grade 5, grade 7 and HEO level are on loan to the FCO and deal with transport and aerospace matters at the British embassy in Washington. One grade 7, also on loan to the FCO, serves in the office of the United Kingdom permanent representative to the European Community in Brussels, dealing with transport matters. The remaining seven officers, who are at grade 7 level or equivalent, are engaged as professional advisers (on aviation, ship safety and statistics) to a number of foreign and dependent territory Governments.

My hon. Friend should seek information about staff of the Civil Aviation Authority from the chairman of the authority.

Public Transport, London

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the budget for London Underground in real terms in (a) 1989, (b) 1975, (c) 1980 and (d) 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 20 July 1990]: Questions about the annual budgets of their subsidiaries are for London Transport. However, investment by London Underground Ltd. in those years was as follows (in 1989-90 prices):

1989-90	307
1975	148
1984-85	151

Investment has more than doubled since the government took over responsibility for funding from the GLC in 1984-85. Over the next three years it will double again.

Marchioness

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to which bridge the river police directed the fire boat when they first heard of the collision between the Marchioness and the Bowbelle on the River Thames on 20 August 1989; when the fire boat and other emergency services were subsequently directed to another bridge; and what was the interval between the directions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 16 July 1990]: I have been asked to reply.

I understand that the marine accident investigation branch of the Department of Transport has included a review of the whole rescue operation as part of its investigation and that the role of Thames division of the Metropolitan police will be covered in the chief inspctor's report.

HOME DEPARTMENT

General Elections

Mr. Barry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proportion of recycled paper is used in general elections by the returning officers;

(2) how many reams or tonnes of paper are used for general election notices, regulations and ballot papers;

(3) if he will estimate the increased consumption of paper required for the simplest form of proportional representation.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Some forms of proportional representation might require little or no increase in the volume of paper used at an election.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many deaths in England and Wales were as a result of assault with (a) a household axe, (b) a kitchen knife, (c) a Stanley knife and (d) a coal hammer in each year since 1980;

(2) how many convictions for grievous bodily harm in England and Wales were as a result of assault with (a) a household axe, (b) a kitchen knife, (c) a Stanley knife and (d) a coal hammer in each year since 1980.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the exact weapon used is not collected for cases of homicide, although the table gives the number of homicides each year between 1980 and 1988 where the principle weapon was a "sharp instrument" or a "blunt instrument"; the figures for 1989 are not yet available.

Information is not collected centrally on the type of weapon used in offences which lead to grievous bodily harm convictions.

Year	Sharp instrument	Blunt instrument
1980	158	62
1981	175	55
1982	191	68
1983	150	68
1984	187	76
1985	180	65
1986	220	67
1987	202	82
1988	198	49

Police Housing Allowances

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will publish details of the new force housing allowance for each of the 43 police forces in England and Wales.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for fixing the new housing allowance lies with the police authority concerned. I understand that the standard housing allowances for federated ranks in those authorities which have fixed a figure are as follows:

Avon and Somerset	1,914·81
Bedfordshire	2,451·84
Cambridgeshire	1,970·77
Cheshire	2,381·47
Cleveland	2,041·91
Cumbria	1,920·24
Derbyshire	3,069·72
Devon and Cornwall	2,680·08
Dorset	2,200·68
Durham	1,766·04
Dyfed-Powys	1,842·00
Essex	3,447·51
Gloucestershire	2,719·21
Greater Manchester	2,022·49
Gwent	2,543·80
Hampshire	3,249·60
Hertfordshire	2,880·00
Humberside	2,424·00
Kent	3,117·70
Leicestershire	2,346·00
Merseyside	1,818·11
Norfolk	2,579·31
Northumbria	1,513·42
North Wales	2,012·28
North Yorkshire	3,212·41
Nottinghamshire	2,244·00
South Wales	2,850·43
South Yorkshire	1,998·52
Staffordshire	1,935·40
Suffolk	3,181·44
Surrey	2,932·92
Sussex	2,425·28
Thames Valley	3,428·36
Warwickshire	2,937·69
West Mercia	2,560·00
West Midlands	2,206·99
West Yorkshire	2,293·46
City of London	4,133·77
Metropolitan	4,133·77

In Lancashire, Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire and Wiltshire a figure has not yet been finally fixed.

Kevin Taylor

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 18 June to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) Official Report, column 429, if he will name the independent senior officer appointed in respect of matters related to the case of Mr. Kevin Taylor.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Police Complaints Authority announced on 19 July that Chief Superintendent Rothwell of the Merseyside police has been appointed to conduct this investigation, under its supervision.

Prisons (Suicides)

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many males aged (a) 15, (b) 16, (c) 17, (d) 18, (e) 19 and (f) 20 years committed suicide or attempted suicide whilst in prison establishments in England and Wales during 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989 and thus far in 1990.

Mr. Mellor: The number of male inmates between the ages of 15 and 20 who died by their own hand in prison service establishments in England and Wales in the years 1986 to 1990 is shown in the table. The figures in brackets give the number of cases where a verdict of suicide was returned at the coroner's inquest. Total figures for attempted suicides in prison service establishments have been held centrally since 1989—I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Sir C. Irving) on 12 March at column 18—but a breakdown of this information by age group is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Death of 15-20 year olds at their own hand in prison custody 1986-90

	Age						Total
	15	16	17	18	19	20
1986	—	—	—	—	4(2)	1(1)	5(3)
1987	—	—	1(1)	1(1)	1(1)	4(4)	7(7)
1988	—	—	2(2)	2(1)	3(3)	2(1)	9(7)
1989	—	—	—	[1]4(3)	7(4)	—	[1]11(7)
1990	[1]1(−)	—	—	[1]3(−)	[1]1(−)	—	[1]4(−)

[1] Inquests have yet to be held on the inmates who have died in 1990 and on one of the 18-year-old inmates who died in 1989.

Police Forces (Annual Reports)

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police forces have not yet published their annual report for the year ended 31 December 1989; and if the Chief Inspector of Constabulary has been informed of this.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand that all police forces have now published their annual reports for the year ended 31 December 1989.

Juvenile Prisoners

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many boys aged 15 and 16 years were being held in gaols in England and Wales on remand and after sentence on the latest available day.

Mr. Mellor: According to the records held centrally, on 30 April 1990, the latest date for which this information is readily available, 65 untried, 19 convicted unsentenced and 19 sentenced juvenile males were held in prisons and remand centres in England and Wales. Of these, 44 untried and 18 convicted unsentenced juveniles were held in remand centres for prisoners aged under 21.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many boys aged 15 and 16 years were being held in (a) Hull, (b) Swansea and (c) Leeds gaol on the latest available day.

Mr. Mellor: The numbers held on 19 July were:

	Number
Hull	12
Swansea	5
Leeds	0

Hindley Remand Centre

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are in custody at Hindley remand centre; what recent significant changes there have been in this number; and for how many prisoners it is intended.

Mr. Mellor: On Friday 20 July 1990, the latest date for which information is available, 420 people were held in custody at Hindley remand centre. The average population at the establishment in 1989-90 was 389, but since the disturbances at Manchester prison in April this year the population at Hindley has averaged around 429. The recent transfer of sentenced young offenders awaiting allocation from Hindley to Stoke Heath young offenders institution has relieved some of the pressure. Further relief is planned when some of the convicted, unsentenced young offenders held at Hindley are also transferred to Stoke Heath. This should happen within the next two weeks.

The certified normal accommodation at Hindley remand centre is currently 312.

Prison Population

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current ratio of prisoners to prison officers; and what it was in 1979.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his answer, 12 July, 1990, c. 320]: The officer to inmate ratio on 1 June 1990 should read 1:2·201.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the steps being taken to halt the decline in applications from ethnic minorities to join the Metropolitan police; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 16 July 1990]: The Commissioner is committed to recruiting and retaining more members of ethnic minority communities. Earlier this year the height requirements for entry to the Metropolitan police, which represented above average heights in certain ethnic minority communities, were abolished.

A pre-employment course has been introduced for candidates who have completed the selection process and who have the potential to be successful police officers but have narrowly failed the police initial recruitment test.

Research was undertaken to find out why people from ethnic minority communities may or may not want to join the police and what they think a career in policing may be like. The current multi-media advertising campaign which targets the recruiting effort towards ethnic minority communities drew on the results of this research.

Further research is under way to find out why some officers from ethnic minority communities resign prematurely from the service.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken by the Metropolitan police to encourage more women to join the force; and what information he has regarding the representation of women in the higher ranks.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 16 July 1990]: In March of this year the Metropolitan police and the Equal Opportunities Commission issued a report of their collaborative exercise. The exercise began in 1984 and continued for four years. It concentrated particularly on the recruitment, deployment and career prospects of women in the Metropolitan police.

The Commissioner is committed to ensuring that the Metropolitan police offers—and is perceived as offering—good career opportunities to all members of society. Since the abolition of the quota system, which limited women officers to 10 per cent. of force strength, in 1984 there has been a considerable increase in the recruitment of women; 25 per cent. of recruits are now women.

The Commissioner is looking at ways of making the service more attractive to women, both to increase further the number of recruits and to improve retention. He has arranged research into job sharing and part-time working and more formal career breaks to enable women to raise families and still return to the service. The outcome of this research is under consideration.

The representation of women in the rank of chief inspector and above in the Metropolitan police is as follows:

	Strength on 31 December 1989
	Women	Total
Commissioner; Deputy Commissioner; Assistant Commissioner	Nil	6
Deputy Assistant Commissioner	Nil	18
Commander	1	38
Chief Superintendent	3	168
Superintendent	6	254
Chief Inspector	8	496

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for information from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on how many new recruits in Newham in 1989 were (a) from ethnic minorities, (b) women and (c) both; and how many officers from the ethnic minorities there are stationed in Newham and at what ranks.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 16 July 1990]: The London borough of Newham is policed by West Ham and Plaistow divisions and the total number of new recurits posted to these divisions in 1989 was 53 of whom 12 were women; none were members of ethnic minority communities.

On 15 July 1990 there were eight officers from ethnic minority communities serving on West Ham and Plaistow divisions: seven constables and one sergeant.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken to put into practice the agreed consultation between the London borough of Newham and the Metropolitan police prior to the production of the Commissioner's Strategy report in January 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 16 July 1990]: Each Metropolitan Police division prepares plans which highlight their objectives for the year. These help to inform the Commissioner's strategy statement. In Newham the chief superintendents from Plaistow and West Ham divisions discuss objectives with a sub-group of the police consultative group in that borough. Two councillors sit on the sub-group.

Hong Kong

Mr. Channon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any proposals to give additional assurances to the spouses of British citizens resident in Hong Kong about their right of entry to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: All spouses of British citizens have the assurance that under the immigration rules they would be entitled to settle in the United Kingdom with that British citizen provided that:

(i) the primary purpose of the marriage was not to obtain admission to the United Kingdom;
(ii) the parties to the marriage have met and intend to live permanently together; and
(iii) the parties can maintain and accommodate themselves adequately without recourse to public funds.

In view of the concern felt by British citizens in the particular circumstances of Hong Kong about the position of their spouses if they died, we have given an assurance that the widow or widower of a British citizen resident in Hong Kong at the time of his death will be allowed to settle in the United Kingdom at any time, either before or after 1997, as if coming here as the spouse of a British citizen. To benefit from this assurance the widow or widower must still be resident in Hong Kong and not have remarried. In addition, we have decided that this assurance—which originally excluded those who were nationals of a third country—should now be available irrespective of the widow or widower's nationality.

We are in addition making arrangements whereby the spouse of a British citizen resident in Hong Kong may approach the Hong Kong immigration department with evidence of the marriage. The details will be noted in a register of non-British citizen spouses of British citizens and the spouse will be given a formal letter issued on my right hon. and learned Friend's behalf confirming that the holder is married to a British citizen. The letter will explain that the spouse is eligible to settle in the United Kingdom providing that the immigration rules requirements are met. It will also include an assurance that a later application for entry clearance will be given priority treatment in view of the information which has already been noted. We are still finalising the details of this, but we hope it will be possible to start providing this service very soon.

I believe that the assurances we have given, and the new arrangements for recording and confirming spouse's details, should remove any fears which British citizens in Hong Kong may have had about their spouses' position and they need feel no reason to leave Hong Kong simply to secure their spouses' immigration status.

Police Interviews

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what are his plans for the introduction of video recordings of police interviews with suspects;

(2) what are his plans for the introduction of video recording of police interviews with suspects.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no such plans at present. Officials are keeping in touch with experimental schemes for the video recording of interviews with suspects which are being carried out in some police forces.

Child Care

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with, and what representations he has received from, the CBI and individual employers, about the part they can play in providing child care.

Mr. Patten [holding answer 18 July 1990]: Home Office Ministers have not been directly involved in dicussions with employers about child care, nor has the Home Office received any representations from employers. The role of the Home Office, through the Ministerial Group on Women's Issues, which I chair, is to co-ordinate action by responsible Departments. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Employment has made known employers' views on child care when it has been considered at the ministerial group.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

European School, Culham

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the likely liability of Her Majesty's Government for the funding of the European school at Culham in the financial years 1989-90, 1990-91 and financial years thereafter; and if he will indicate the principal items of expenditure for each year and the number of pupils and staff at the school in the current year.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The cost of maintaining the European schools is shared between individual member states and the European Commission. In the case of the European school at Culham the Government are responsible for the costs of maintaining the school's premises and for the costs of the national salaries of the United Kingdom teachers which it seconds to the school. Premises costs in 1989-90 were £219,000, and in 1990-91 are expected to amount to £456,000; costs in future years have yet to be settled. Salaries costs for United Kingdom teachers in 1989-90 were £346,000, and in 1990-91 are expected to amount to about £400,000; subject to national salaries increases for teachers in the United Kingdom, expenditure in future years is expected to be on the same pattern. There will be 827 pupils and 111 teaching staff, of whom 18 will be United Kingdom teachers, in the school at the start of the academic year beginning this September.

GCSE

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what target the Government has for the percentage of 16 to 18-year-olds who will have five GCSEs at grade A to C or better or equivalent (a) in the current year and (b) by 1995.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government's objectives are to promote a significant increase in attainments of this age group through the introduction of the national curriculum and improvements in the GCSE and other qualifications. It would not be appropriate in our view to establish quantified targets for such attainments. Such targets could imply that the Government have control over the outcome, which is not the case; and there is a risk that their promulgation could lead to adjustments in the standards demanded, so that the targets would be reached on paper.

It is for pupils themselves, their teachers and schools, to strive to achieve the highest possible success rate within the context set by Government policy.

Attainment Statistics

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will publish tables for each local education authority and for England, giving the four benchmarks of attainment, adjusting the data to take account of socio-economic background in a manner consistent with statistical bulletins 12/83 and 13/84.

Mr. MacGregor: No. We have considered this, but adjustments to the attainment data to allow for socio-economic background would have to be based on data from the 1981 census of population, which would no longer accurately reflect the current position in all local education authorities.

Prosthetics and Orthotics Courses

Mr. Orme: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations his Department has received regarding the delay in funding prosthetics and orthotics courses at Salford and their consequences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend received four letters earlier this year about proposals to establish courses in prosthetics and orthotics jointly at Salford university and Salford college of technology. It is for higher education institutions themselve. to determine the priority they give to such developments, in consultation with the funding councils as appropriate.

Higher Education Corporations

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to publish a guide to the law for governors of higher education corporations; and if he will list the published guidance already available.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend has no such plans; nor has he a list of existing guidance published elsewhere. It is for each individual higher education corporation governing body to conduct its own affairs within the framework provided by the relevant provisions in the Education Reform Act and the corporation's articles of government, and taking its own legal advice as necessary.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information his Department records on the number of complaints and the frequency with which directions are issued under section 68 of the Education Act 1944 in respect of higher education corporations.

Mr. Jackson: Complaints in respect of higher education corporations are received, considered and, when a response has been made, placed on departmental files in the normal way.

Ministerial Speeches

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many copies of the summary of messages from his recent speeches to teacher associations have been distributed to schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: More than 76,500 copies of the Secretary of State's summary from recent speeches to teacher associations have been distributed to schools.

Student Loans

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what would be the estimated difference in cost to the Exchequer in financial years 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93 of (a) the student loans scheme and (b) the grants system.

Mr. Jackson: The information is as follows:

	[1]Costs of [2]Loans scheme £ million	[3]Grants scheme £ million
1990-91	193	222
1991-92	227	267
1992-93	248	304

Notes

[1] In academic years on the basis of forecast student numbers underlying the forecast of costs and savings associated with the introduction of the loans scheme published on 18 December 1989 at columns 36-40. Information on a financial year basis is not available in the form requested.

[2] Including the forecasts of loans outlay, repayments and estimated administration costs.

[3] On the hypothesis that what the Government intend should be available for each eligible student as loan will instead be given as grant.

Teaching (Recruitment)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to recruit bright young people into the teaching profession; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Bright young people completing first degrees are an important source of teachers.

Initial teacher training bursaries are available to attract students to train to teach in shortage subjects. A number of innovative and more flexible courses are starting this autumn. The teaching as a career unit attends university careers fairs and places advertisements specifically designed to attract new graduates into teacher training. Young, first-degree students responding to the current national teacher advertising campaign are sent information packs specially compiled to meet their interests and needs. A work experience scheme in schools is being made available for students this September, and teaching taster courses will also be extended to undergraduates.

High Schools (Redundancies)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement concerning the number of staff redundancies in high schools in England since 1 January 1989.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The employment and deployment of teachers is a matter for local education authorities and, following the introduction of local management of schools from April 1990, for governing bodies of schools with delegated budgets.

Soviet and East European Studies

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will now make a statement on the recommendations of the Wooding report on Soviet and east European studies in higher education.

Mr. Jackson: The Government welcomed the proposal to review the state of Soviet and east European studies in British higher education, and is grateful to the Universities Funding Council for commissioning the review undertaken by a working party under the chairmanship of Dr. Norman Wooding. A copy of the report on that review has been placed in the Library. While some of the recommendations in the report are addressed to the Government, many of them are for consideration by individual higher education institutions, the agencies that fund them and other bodies.

The Universities Funding Council issued the report to universities. I am sure that they will have examined carefully its conclusions and proposals as they prepared their academic plans for future years, taking into account both national priorities as well as local circumstances. The council will be responding to those plans when it decides how to allocate funding to each university. The Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council is engaged in similar planning and funding processes with its institutions.

The Department has been considering the recommendations to which it is proper for the Government to respond, and consulting other Government Departments and organisations.

Government funding is helping to develop Soviet and east European studies. The Prime Minister announced the creation of additional lectureships during her recent visit to the Soviet Union. The scheme will be administered by the British Council through a special advisory committee whose members will include Dr. Wooding. The sum involved will be in the order of £300,000 over the financial years 1991-92 to 1993-94. The aim is to establish up to 10 posts, with the costs to be shared with the higher education institutions and other sources including the private sector. I hope that this initiative will encourage higher education institutions to develop their provision in Soviet and east European studies.

In addition, both the Economic and Social Research Council—ESRC—and the British Academy are at present using a substantial proportion of their budgets to support activities in this field with the number of ESRC studentships in this subject area more than doubling over the past four years. There are currently 25 research postgraduates and 12 postgraduates on advanced courses being supported by council funds, and I understand that the council stands ready to award more studentships as suitable applicants come forward. In addition, the council is embarking on a major research initiative to investigate the economic, social and political changes occurring in eastern Europe, and is also funding 18 other projects in the field of Soviet and east European studies.

The total public funding made available to universities, polytechnics and colleges in 1990-91 is being increased by some 10 per cent. over the funding available in 1989-90, and should allow institutions to plan for growth in different areas, including Soviet and east European Studies. It will, however, continue to be for the institutions themselves, in consultation with the funding councils, to determine how such funding will best be distributed.

The responsibilities of the funding councils for funding their respective institutions were given statutory effect through provisions of the Education Reform Act 1988. This Act also extended the university tradition of self-government and self-regulation to all higher education institutions. The processes for allocating public funds for higher education pay due regard both to the funding councils' responsibilities and to the institutions' autonomy in using the public funds at their disposal. As a consequence, the DES does not earmark funds for specific purposes such as Soviet and east European studies out of its general expenditure programme.

Both the Government and the funding councils are adopting funding processes which avoid over-emphasis on central planning for higher education. The development of academic policy within individual institutions in the 1990s will be subject to a wider range of external influences. Student choice and the demands of employers will play a more important part. This approach is necessary to avoid past inefficiencies and produce a better match between national needs and the output of our educational system.

For these reasons, it is not considered appropriate for the Government to set up the kind of central administrative body recommended in the Wooding report. A co-ordinating body which might help to define the market for Soviet and east European studies generally and encourage the involvement of the private sector may have a contribution to make, and I would hope that institutions would take the initiative in setting up such a body if they consider that their planning processes would be assisted by so doing.

I am sure that there is scope for greater collaboration between higher education institutions and industry in the field of Soviet and east European studies. The Wooding report hints at this and suggests some ways forward. There are now more opportunities for trade with the Soviet Union and the countries of central and eastern Europe than ever before. A growing number of business men are pursuing export and investment activities in eastern Europe and they should be made aware of the considerable expertise available in higher education which can help them to expand in these markets.

A network of language export centres has been set up to serve local businesses, and there are opportunities for sponsoring research and other activities in academic departments offering Soviet and east European studies.

Business men have often been reminded of the advantages of doing business in the language of the customer. If they make good use of the increasing number of students graduating in Soviet and east European studies, even more students will want to specialise in these subjects. And greater student demand will in turn prompt institutions to expand provision.

Finally, the Wooding report made some recommendations relating to the teaching of Russian in schools. The inclusion of a modern foreign language in the national curriculum and the Government's policy of diversifying first foreign language provision will help to rectify previous deficiencies in language learning generally. I am convinced that there will be more opportunities for learning modern languages such as Russian in our secondary schools as these policies take effect. Through various measures the Government are also addressing the shortage of language teachers and expanding the exchange programmes which involve teacher and pupil visits to the Soviet Union.

All this should in time stimulate the demand for language teaching at the tertiary level, and work through to stronger provision for Soviet and east European studies in higher education.

Medical Research Council

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the research projects and amount of funding by the Medical Research Council for each of the past five years, identifying those which relate to natural medicine.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 17 July 1990]: Details of all the research projects supported by the Medical Research Council are listed in its handbook, published annually, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House. Total expenditure by the council on research projects in the period 1985-86 to 1988-89 was:

1985-86	117·9
1986-87	123·5
1988-89	146·2

An expenditure figure for 1989-90 will be available at the end of July. The council takes natural medicine to mean homeopathy. It has not supported any research relating to homeopathy in the last five years. In the general area of complementary medicine, the council has recently funded the trial of chiropractic treatment of low back pain. It is always willing to consider soundly based proposals in competition with other applications.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the criteria for deciding whether to approve the establishment of city technology colleges on sites occupied by existing schools at the time of application.

Mrs. Rumbold [holding answer 20 July 1990]: I refer the hon. Member to the paper "CTCs established in existing schools", which has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Recess (Members' Facilities)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list in detail the reductions to the services and facilities available to hon. Members which take place during the summer recess in both the main buildings and the Norman Shaw blocks.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Members and Strangers Cafeterias will be closed until Monday 10 September. The Westminster Hall Cafeteria will be closed from Monday 10 September to Tuesday 25 September. When open, all cafeterias will operate between 10 am and 4 pm.

The Strangers' Bar will be closed until Monday 3 September and will then be open between 11 am and 3 pm. The Terrace Pavilion and Dining Rooms A to D will be closed until 4 September when they will reopen for banquets.

The Souvenir Kiosk will be open throughout the recess between the hours of 11 am and 4 pm; and the vending machines in the Upper Waiting hall and in Norman Shaw South building will continue to operate.

The Members and Strangers Dining Rooms, the Pugin Room, the Members Tea Room, the Smoking Room, the Harcourt Grill Room, and Annie's Bar will be closed throughout the recess.

Certain other minor services and facilities, usually available to hon. Members when the House is in Session, will not be available for practical or economic reasons.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will state the number of occasions in each of the Sessions 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 when the House of Commons has approved any statutory instrument which (a) annuls existing statutory instruments and (b) repeals any part of or whole Acts of Parliament consequent on any treaty, regulation, or directive of the European Community; and if he will list by name and part all Acts included in (b) above.

Sir Geoffrey Howe [holding answer 4 July 1990]: The information requested is as follows.

Statutory instruments made under section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972 which have revoked existing statutory instruments

	Number
1987-88	11
1989-90	3

Statutory instruments made under section 2(2) of the 1972 Act which have repealed any part of or whole Acts of Parliament

	Number
1987-88	[1]1

[2] Food Act 1984, sections 3(3) and (4), 36(1)(c), 48(1), (2) and (4), 48(3) in part;
Food and Drugs (Scotland) Act 1956, sections 17(2), 18(1), (2), (4) and (5), 18(3) in part.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Group of Seven Legislatives

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council what information he has on the normal starting times of legislatures in the Group of Seven countries.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Normal starting times of lower Houses are at present as follows:

(a) Canada: Mondays—1300, Tuesdays—1100, Wednesdays—1400, Thursdays—1100, Fridays—1000;
(b) France: 0930, except that there is a nine-hour pause after late-night sessions;
(c) Federal Republic of Germany: 0900;
(d) Italy: 0930;
(e) Japan: 1300;
(f) United States of America: Mondays and Tuesdays —1200, Wednesdays—1400, Thursdays and Fridays —1100.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Fire Safety

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many prosecutions have been brought against furniture retailers-manufacturers for contravention of the new fire safety regulations.

Mr. Forth: Enforcement of the Furniture and Furnishing (Fire) (Safety) Regulations 1988 and the 1989 amendment is a matter for the local authorities trading standards departments in Great Britain and for district councils in Northern Ireland. The limited information available centrally shows that there have been nine prosecutions under these regulations, to June 1990 in the United Kingdom, resulting in fines totalling £4,870.

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry since the new safety regulations were introduced for furniture manufacturing and importing, how many consignments of furniture landing at United Kingdom ports have been found to fail the appropriate standard of safety levels; and how many consignments have been tested.

Mr. Forth: The information requested about inquiries undertaken in connection with the furniture regulations, is not collected centrally and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Summary Financial Statements

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, further to the reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby on 14 March, Official Report, column 304, he will list the organisations which endorsed the publication of summary financial statements.

Mr. Redwood: There was general support for this proposal among those consulted. However, it is not the usual practice of my Department to disclose the nature of individual responses to requests for views on company law matters. Comments were received from the following organisations:

the Chartered Association of Certified Accountants;
the Chartered Institute of Management Accountants;
the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy;
the Confederation of British Industry;
the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales;
the Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland;
the Institute of Chartered Accountants in Scotland;
the Institute of Chartered Secretaries and Administrators;
the Institute of Directors;
the International Stock Exchange; the Securities and Investment Board; and the Wider Share Ownership Council.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give a breakdown of the savings which companies are expected to make following the enactment of section 15 of the Companies Act 1989.

Mr. Redwood: I have made no such estimate.

Accountancy Firms

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement on his co-operation with the European Community Commission's inquiry into price-fixing by accountancy firms.

Mr. Redwood: The consultants who are carrying out a study on audit and consultancy on behalf of the European Commission met my officials on 19 March this year. My officials made it clear that they were happy to provide any further information that was required.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the unpublished reports of his Department's inspectors contain criticisms of accountancy firms.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) on 19 July 1990, Official Report, column 679.

Auditing Standards

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will bring forward legislation to enable the litigant, in the event of a successful negligence lawsuit against an auditing firm, to sue the Auditing Practices Committee for the promulgation of inadequate auditing standards.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Textiles and Clothing

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current level of duty including all additional duties on United Kingdom exports of knitted outerwear to (a) Turkey, (b) India and (c) Pakistan; and what non-tariff barriers to these exports exist in the same countries.

Mr. Redwood: Duties on knitted outerwear under chapter 61 of the harmonised system exported from the United Kingdom to Turkey, India and Pakistan are 15, 160, and 125 per cent. respectively. Turkey also applies various additional taxes which add roughly 50 per cent. to the total cost of imports of knitted outerwear.

In addition, imports of knitted outerwear are banned in Pakistan, and in India are permitted only under licences which are issued only if the goods do not compete with domestic production. India also applies numerous other non-tariff barriers, including customs formalities, exchange control procedures and facilities for local producers, on these and other items.

Knowledge-based Systems

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is adopting to encourage United Kingdom manufacturers to take advantage of progress in the area of knowledge-based systems.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am pleased to announce that my Department has recently agreed to support a £3·8 million programme to encourage United Kingdom manufacturing and processing industries to adopt the computer software technology of knowledge-based systems, also known as "expert systems". The DTI contribution will be £1·9 million. The programme, called manufacturing intelligence, is targeted at strategic decision makers. It aims to increase awareness of how this technology can enable companies to improve their operational effectiveness and suggests ways in which they might best implement the new methods in their own factories. Innovative applications will be promoted through industrial collaborative projects. The programme is intended to promote the uptake of new technology in United Kingdom industry and should substantially contribute to increased productivity and competitiveness.

David Abell

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in his Department's investigation into allegations of insider trading by David Abell, chairman of Souter; when the report of the investigation will be published; and whether the investigation extends to the conduct of the Souter supplementary pension fund and the Souter group pension fund.

Mr. Redwood: The appointment of inspectors to investigate possible insider dealing offences is not normally announced and section 179 of the Financial Services Act 1986 precludes the publication of their reports. If the hon. Gentleman has information which he believes I should consider I should be pleased if he would pass it to me.

Electrical Contractors (Exhibition Halls)

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if any appeal has been lodged against his decision, following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report, to ban ties between electrical contractors and exhibition hall owners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: An application for leave for judicial review of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on electrical contracting at exhibition halls in London has been filed by Earls Court and Olympia Ltd., Philbeach Events Ltd. and Ecando Ltd. I understand that they have received leave for judicial review and I expect papers to be served during the course of this week.

Germany (Contracts)

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions are being held with the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany regarding opportunities for British firms to compete with West German firms in tendering for contracts in the former German Democratic Republic.

Mr. Redwood: In our recent contracts with the Governments of both the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic both have repeatedly stressed their wish to see British firms extend their activities in the East German market. My own visit to East Berlin last month with a delegation of British business men took forward the process of British involvement. A number of invitations were secured to pursue business opportunities and to submit plans and tenders for work. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to meet his West German opposite number, Dr Haussmann, in Berlin on 17 September, accompanied by teams of top-level business men. Discussions will focus on the opportunities for Anglo-German trade and co-operation in central and eastern Europe with particular reference to the German Democratic Republic, and on the single market.

Shops (Customer Toilets)

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to require supermarkets and chain stores to provide toilet facilities for customers' use; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: No.

Financial Services (Germany)

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions are taking place within the European Community concerning opportunities for non-German firms and financial institutions to compete with West German companies in the provision of financial services in the former German Democratic Republic.

Mr. Redwood: The Government expect United Kingdom financial firms to have the same access to the whole of Germany following unification as they presently have to the West German market, including the benefits that derive from European Community legislation on financial services. The EC's programme for the creation of a single European market for financial services, including new directives on banking, investment and insurance business, should ensure that firms from other member states enjoy greater opportunities in the German financial markets from 1 January 1993. The Government expect these directives to apply to the whole of the European Community, including the territory currently covered by the German Democratic Republic.

Swimming Aids (Safety)

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he takes to ensure that imported swimming aids for children meet British safety regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The requirements of the Toys (Safety) Regulations 1989 apply to arm bands with fewer than two air chambers. Other swimming aids are subject to the general safety requirement of the Consumer Protection Act 1987. Trading standards departments of local authorities which have responsibility for enforcing consumer safety legislation have the necessary powers to take action against unsafe goods.

Telecommunications

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the balance of trade in (a) telecommunications operating services and (b) telecommunications equipment supply in each year since 1979.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 19 July 1990]: Information on the balance of trade in telecommunications operating services is not available. The information for the equipment supply industry is given in the table.

Balance of trade in Activity Heading 3441— Telegraph and Telephone Apparatus and Equipment

1979	+50
1980	+27
1981	+36
1982	+19
1983	−43
1984	−51
1985	−71
1986	−146
1987	−276
1988	−357
1989	−245

Source: Business Monitors MQ10.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of telecommunications equipment sold in the United Kingdom is imported.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 19 July 1990]: Twenty-eight per cent. in the 12 months ending March 1989.

Company Relocation (Eastern Europe)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact upon British industry of the relocation of multinational companies from United Kingdom to lower-wage economies in eastern Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 19 July 1990]: I have no evidence of any such problem at present. Nonetheless, I am ready to consider any contrary indications that the hon. Member may wish to draw to my attention. Companies have to take into account a wide variety of factors including market demand, productivity, taxation and skills when locating. The United Kingdom remains a very good place for multinational investment.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the average premium rate payable, assuming no claims experience, by those policyholders with the Export Credits Guarantee Department with an annual export turnover of under £500,000 in each of the years 1985 to 1989;

(2) what was the average premium rate payable, assuming no claims experience, by those policyholders with the Export Credits Guarantee Department with an annual export turnover of under £1 million in each of the years 1985 to 1989;

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the average premium rate payable, assuming no claims experience, in the current financial year by those policyholders with the Export Credits Guarantee Department with an annual export turnover of (a) under £1 million and (b) under £500,000 in each of the nine regional offices of the Export Credits Guarantee Department;

(2) what was the average premium rate payable, assuming no claims experience, in the current financial year, for those policyholders with the Export Credits Guarantee Department with an annual export turnover of (a) under £500,000 and (b) under £1 million in each of the five years 1985 to 1989.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 19 July 1990]: The ECGD insures contracts with buyers in specified countries and does not necessarily require policyholders to inform the ECGD of their annual exports turnovers. In addition, the ECGD has a flexible premium policy, which takes account of a number of factors and generally quotes for agreed packages of risks and cover. Accordingly, information is not held in the form required to cover the question.

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the number of policyholders with the Export Credits Guarantee Department with an annual export turnover of under £500,000 in each of the years 1985 to 1989.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 19 July 1990]: The ECGD insures contracts with buyers in specified countries and does not necessarily require policyholders to inform the ECGD of their annual export turnovers. In addition, some companies insure their business with the ECGD through an intermediary rather than direct with the ECGD. Accordingly, information is not held in the form required to answer the question. In the financial year 1989-90, a total of 4,720 policyholders each declared business of less than £1 million. These figures refer only to the Cardiff-based insurance services short-term business and not to project business.

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many organisations have indicated an interest in acquiring the Export Credits Guarantee Department's Cardiff-based short-term credit insurance operations.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 20 July 1990]: A number of representations and expressions of interest have been received. However, the details are a matter of commercial confidence.

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure that a monopoly is not created as a result of the privatisation of Export Credits Guarantee Department's Cardiff operations.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 20 July 1990]: No decisions have yet been taken on the future ownership of ECGD's insurance services operations. The normal competition legislation and procedures will apply.

Manufacturing Engineering

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing the share of gross domestic product contributed by manufacturing engineering in the Group of Seven countries in 1979 and in the latest available year.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 20 July 1990]: The information is in the table.

Manufacturing engineering[3] as a percentage of gross domestic product in the Group of Seven countries

	1979	1987
Canada	5·9	[1]5·7
France	9·7	8·2
Germany	14·6	[2]15·0
Italy	10·3	8·4
Japan	11·1	12·1
United Kingdom	12·5	9·6
United States of America	9·9	8·1

[2] Latest year 1986.
[3] Manufacturing engineering for the Group of Seven (except the United Kingdom) is defined in the table according to the International Standard Industrial Classification (ISIC) division 38 (covering manufacture of fabricated metal products, machinery and equipment). For the United Kingdom the definition of manufacturing engineering used is the Standard Industrial Classification (SIC) section 3 (covering metal goods, engineering and vehicle industries). The percentages shown are based on current market prices, with the exception of the United Kingdom where factor costs are used.

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage change has taken place in real terms in the value of United Kingdom exports of mechanical engineering and metal goods between 1979 and 1989.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 20 July 1990]: The relevant classifications in this area are mechanical machinery—standard international trade classification 71-74 less 716—and metal manufactures—SITC 69. Between 1979 and 1989 export volumes for these sectors rose by 15 and 2 per cent. respectively in real terms.

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the future trends in United Kingdom exports of mechanical and metal engineering products.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 20 July 1990]: The Department does not publish any forecasts of this sort. A number of private sector organisations compile sectoral forecasts which are available on a commercial basis.

Exports

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give a breakdown of exports between 1979 and 1989, showing which discrete sectors have increased the value of their exports in real terms.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 20 July 1990]: Annual figures for United Kingdom exports volumes indices by commodity type are given on an SITC basis in tables B7-B12 of the Central Statistical Office's monthly review of external trade statistics. Annual supplement No. 10 gives years to 1988, including 1979; issue No. 174 gives data for 1989. These publications are held by the House of Commons Library. In 49 out of 52 sectors in the above review there have been increases in export volume.

Export Credit Agencies

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish details of the premium rates charged by the export credit agencies of the Group of Seven countries for medium and long-term project cover.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 20 July 1990]: The premium rates charged by officially supported export credit agencies in the Group of Seven countries for medium and long term project cover vary, depending, inter alia, on the nature of the risk to be insured. Most are not published. It is not, therefore, possible to provide the information requested.

THE ARTS

Arts Bodies

82. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister for the Arts what information he has on the total numbers employed in Government-funded arts bodies and projects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: There are 9,000 staff in the institutions funded directly by my office, but there are many more in the arts organisations and projects which are the ultimate recipients of Government funding.

Private Sponsorship

84. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement about the level of private sponsorship of the arts.

Mr. Luce: The level of business sponsorship of the arts continues to grow. Under the Government's business sponsorship incentive scheme over £32 million new money has been raised and nearly 1,500 first-time sponsors have supported the arts.

Arts Institutions (Borrowing Powers)

85. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Minister for the Arts what consultations he has had in order to give arts and science institutions borrowing powers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The Government's financial support to the institutions sponsored by my office is in the form of grants and grants-in-aid.

Although the Government do not normally permit borrowing powers in these circumstances, I and my colleagues study any new proposals with care.

West Yorkshire Playhouse

86. Mr. Battle: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he plans to visit the West Yorkshire Playhouse to discuss arts policy and its future level of funding.

Mr. Luce: I am pleased to say that I hope to visit the West Yorkshire Playhouse tomorrow.

Planning Policy

87. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received on the importance of developing planning policy guidance on the arts.

Mr. Luce: Planning policy guidance is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) on 11 July, Official Report, column 196.

Buildings Audit

88. Mrs. Golding: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will make it his policy to establish a national audit of buildings in the arts, museums and library services.

Mr. Luce: As I made clear in the debate on the arts and heritage on 4 July, I take account of the buildings' needs and priorities set out in the corporate plans I receive annually from the trustees of the national museums and galleries in England. I am at present providing £180 million over the next three years towards these needs. It is for other relevant funding bodies, including local authorities, to determine the needs for the buildings within their responsibility, but I have indicated my support for the general need to put arts buildings in good order over the coming years.

Arts Funding, Leicestershire

89. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received concerning funding for the arts in Leicestershire.

Mr. Luce: I receive representations about funding for the arts in Leicestershire from time to time.

Natural History Museum

91. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Minister for the Arts what recent representations he has received about the impact of proposed staff reductions on the natural history museum's scientific and educational work.

Mr. Luce: I have received a number of further representations from hon. Members and members of the public about the natural history museum's future plans for scientific and educational work.

Performers (Taxation)

92. Dr. Marek: To ask the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received on the tax position of performers.

Mr. Luce: I have received several representations on the tax position of performers.

Scottish Arts Council

93. Dr. Godman: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last met the chairman of the Scottish Arts Council; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Luce: I last met Sir Alan Peacock on 19 October 1989 when we discussed various matters.

Arts and Heritage (Legislation)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received about the importance of including (a) the arts and (b) heritage in the Government's legislative programme.

Mr. Luce: I have received no representations about the inclusion of the performing arts in the Government's legislative programme. I have, however, received a number of representations calling for fresh legislation to control the export of works of art, antiques and collectors' items, particularly in the light of 1992.

Disabled People

95. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Minister for the Arts what plans he has to increase investment in arts facilities for people with disabilities.

Mr. Luce: My aim is for the arts to be accessible to everyone. In December 1988 I gave £150,000 to the Carnegie Trust's adapt fund for the improvement of facilities for disabled people in arts venues. By use of challenge grants the fund aims to encourage additional, and at least equal, financial contributions for local communities. In addition, the Arts Council has published a report on arts and disability to encourage arts organisations to take account of the needs of disabled people in their planning. A copy of the report is available in the Library of the House.

Works of Art (Disposal)

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will list the items for which the issuing of export licences was withheld on the recommendation of the reviewing committee on the export of works of art during the half year ended 30 June, specifying in each case the valuation and whether an item was exported or retained, with particulars in the latter event of the acquiring institution; whether he will list any items for which licences have been withheld but the final disposal of which is not yet decided, specifying in each case (a) the valuation and (b) the relevant time limits; and whether a press notice will be issued from his Department covering the information given in his reply.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry accepted my recommendation, following consideration by the reviewing committee on the export of works of art, to defer making for a specified period a decision on an export licence application in respect of the items listed. Details of all the items listed were given in press notices issued at the time the Secretary of State decided to accept the recommendation.

Description of Item	Valuation £	Outcome
The Razzle Dazzle fairground ride	135,000	Decision with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Imports and Exports

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the United Kingdom's exports to and imports from (a) France, (b) West Germany, (c) the Netherlands and (d) Italy for (i) beef, (ii) lamb, (iii) pigmeat, (iv) milk products and (v) eggs in 1987, 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is given in £ million in the following table. Except for bacon and ham, only fresh, chilled or frozen meat has been included.

Livestock Holdings

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many livestock holdings there are currently in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: Based on the June 1989 Agricultural census, the estimated number of United Kingdom holdings, excluding minor holdings, with any type of livestock, including poultry, is 183,813.

Swine Swill Farms

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey of 5 July, Official Report column 688, how many swine swill farms were visited last year; what was the total number of visits conducted by the State Veterinary Service; on how many occasions (a) prosecution was recommended, (b) prosecution followed and (c) conviction followed; and what was the fine or other penalty in each case.

Mr. Maclean: In 1989, a total of 330 swill premises in Great Britain were visited and 1,453 visits were made, in total. Prosecution was recommended to the local authority on eight occasions and actual prosecutions followed in four cases. All four prosecutions were successful. Penalties were as follows: £500, £250, £250 and £300. In each case the defendant was also required to pay costs.

Perrier Water (Labelling)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his reply of 21 May, Official Report, column 83, what progress has been made in securing the correct labelling of Perrier water.

Mr. Maclean: I am continuing to press for the labelling of Perrier to be adjusted to ensure consumers are properly informed of the true nature of the product. I hope to have something to report shortly.

Rights of Way

Dr. Woodcock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make funds available to create temporary rights of way over land which is not in the set-aside scheme so as to link land which is in the set-aside scheme, and to which public access could be given, to areas over which the public have access rights or with existing rights of way.

Mr. Curry: I have no powers to make funds available to create temporary rights of way to enable set-aside land to be linked to the existing network of public rights of way. Owners or occupiers of land are, of course free to dedicate land as a public right of way or to create permissive paths. Under section 25 of the Highways Act 1980 the highway authorities can, by agreement with owners or occupiers of land create paths and provide payments.

Dr. Woodcock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will include as a condition of the registration of all land in set-aside schemes a requirement that rights of way must be maintained in good order.

Mr. Curry: No. It is already a statutory requirement that all landowners should maintain stiles and gates across public rights of way, keep rights of way clear of overhanging vegetation and prevent rights of way from becoming obstructed by, for example, growing crops or barbed wire. Set-aside land is no different from any other land in this respect.

Countryside (Access)

Dr. Woodcock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to increase public access to the countryside.

Mr. Curry: Under section 17 of the Agriculture Act 1986, my right hon. Friend the Minister has to balance the interests of promoting an efficient agricultural industry, the conservation and enhancement of the natural beauty and amenity of the countryside and its enjoyment by the public. It is generally recognised that there is a delicate balance between the increasing demand for public access and its impact upon the countryside and farming. The Department's policies are designed to encourage farmers, wherever practicable, to provide for countryside recreation. To this end, grants are available under the farm diversification grant scheme for farm walks and nature trails. The Department has also, jointly with the Countryside Commission, published a ploughing code which reminds farmers of their responsibilities in relation to rights of way. This will shortly be revised to take account of the new provisions of the Rights of Way Act 1990 which comes into operation on 13 August.

Dr. Woodcock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will modify the set-aside scheme to require public access to be given on a proportion of the land.

Mr. Curry: The non-agricultural use option under the set-aside scheme already enables participants to use the land for activities allowing public access such as tourist facilities, caravan and camping sites and sports and recreational pursuits. In addition, the countryside premium scheme for set-aside land, currently operating in seven eastern counties of England, offers payments to farmers who agree to manage their set-aside land in ways which benefit wildlife, the landscape and informal recreation. The most popular choice is the meadowland option, which is designed to provide areas for quiet enjoyment by local communities.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many subject access requests under the terms of the Data Protection Act his Department has received; what was his estimate of the number of requests that would be received; what consideration he is giving to the subject access fee charged by his Department as a result; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: During the period that the Data Protection Act has been in force the Department has received 220 requests for subject access, including one from a member of the public, for which a fee was charged. Based on central guidance, it was estimated orginally that around 3,200 requests might have been received in this period.

There have been very few inquiries on subject access from members of the public and there is no evidence to suggest that the fee is an inhibiting factor. Therefore we are not at present reconsidering the subject access fee charged by the Department.

Abattoirs

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place in the Library a list of abattoirs in the United Kingdom, indicating which are European Community approved and which have had their European Community licences suspended.

Mr. Gummer: I am placing in the Library of the House a current list of the abattoirs in England and Wales which identifies those which are export approved. Seven of the export-approved abattoirs are temporarily suspended from engaging in intra-Community trade. Suspension is applied for a short period while attention is given to some structural or operational requirements, and it would not be appropriate to identify those plants which may be suspended at any one time.

The Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland have responsibility for abattoirs in those parts of the United Kingdom.

Renderers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions, for each year since 1979 inclusive, representatives of the Renderers Association or similar organisations have met Ministers.

Mr. Gummer: In recent years Ministers from my Department have had frequent meetings with representatives of the United Kingdom rendering industry to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for how many of its own employees his Department proposes to pay the poll tax; what will be the cost to public funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The Department has increased the good local practice element of payments to 188 full-time farm workers employed at the ADAS experimental husbandry farms and the horticultural stations in the British Society of Horticultural Research by amounts sufficient to retain our competitive position as employers of farm labour in the respective localities. The additional cost involved will be about £44,000 in the current financial year.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about recent representations he has received concerning fishing in sea area VII.

Mr. Curry: I have received a number of representations from hon. Members and fishing industry representatives. I have had a useful and constructive exchange of views with industry representatives about the problem of misreporting and how to limit misreporting in future.

Spanish Fishing Vessels

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the implications for the United Kingdom fishing fleet of recent court decisions relating to re-registered Spanish fishing vessels; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The recent judgment of the European Court of Justice in case 213/89 Factortame means that national courts may grant interim relief in respect of a national law when there is an alleged breach of Community law rights, pending a ruling on the substantive issue. The question whether such relief should be given was heard by the House of Lords at the beginning of the month.

The House of Lords is expected to give a ruling before the summer recess and it is not possible to assess the implications before that announcement is made.

Marine Life

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research is being carried out on the long-term effects of dredging on marine life.

Mr. Curry: The Ministry has carried out research investigations relevant to the problems posed to fish and shellfish resources by gravel extraction since the 1970s. In the vicinity of Hastings shingle bank they have comprised diving and sonar studies on the infilling of experimental pits; diver, underwater camera and remote vehicle searches for overwintering crabs and a general description of the benthos using scientific dredges. Current commercial dredging activity off Hastings and the Isle of Wight is being monitored by side scan sonar prior to future benthic studies. The importance of the eastern channel for crab spawning and potential impact of aggregate extraction is currently being asessed using plankton surveys.

The Ministry is now initiating a three-year study to assess the impact of gravel extraction on marine life. The objectives will be to assess the initial impact of dredging benthos and the recovery of benthic life once dredging has ceased. The study will identify recruitment from plankton and other benthic communities in terms of the diversity of taxonomic groups present and the densities of individuals.

Beef Premium

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the widow of Mr. L. T. Smith, formerly of Lyn Jay Farm, India Row, Monkton, Pembroke, will receive from the beef intervention board premium payment for three cattle sold on 19 July 1989, in respect of which certificate 043929 was issued on that date.

Mr. Curry: This certificate could not be cleared until probate documentation was available. Payment was made on 11 July 1990.

Fishing Catches

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will hold a full inquiry into the misreporting of catches alleged to have come from sector VIIa.

Mr. Curry: As I said in my reply to the hon. Member on 18 July, Fisheries Departments accept that the circumstantial evidence points to some misreporting having taken place, but we must have hard evidence in order to prosecute. Departments are therefore examining all fishing documents of vessels which might have been involved. They are also looking urgently at ways of limiting misreporting in future.

Committees (Disclosure of Information)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place in the Library a copy of each of the different types of form the members of his various committees have to sign concerning the disclosure of information from the those committees.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 16 July 1990]: Copies are being placed in the Library of declarations about the unauthorised disclosure of information from the following committees:

Consumers Committee for Great Britain.
Consumers Committee for England and Wales.
Advisory Committee on Pesticides.
Salmon Advisory Committee.

Avon Dam Drought Order

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the cost of the public inquiry into South West Water's application for an Avon dam drought order.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 16 July 1990]: I have been asked to reply.

The payroll cost to the Department of providing an inspector to hold a public inquiry and report on the application by South West Water services to reduce the compensation flow from the Avon dam into the River Avon near South Brent was £598. There were also costs incurred by the Department on administration and by other public bodies involved in the inquiry.

WALES

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department will fund a development office for the ME Association in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The association received £5,000 grant aid from the Department in 1988-89 and £7,500 in 1989-90 towards the cost of a development officer, but returned £2,500 of the latter following the resignation of the person whose post had been supported. No formal application for further grant has yet been received, but any future applications will be carefully considered.

Disabled People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what consultations he has had with (a) health authorities and (b) local authority associations in Wales concerning the regulations to be made under section 2(7) of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 in order to extend the rights of authorised representatives; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he intends to lay an order to bring into force (a) sections 1 and 2 and (b) section 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what consultations he is having with local authority associations in Wales concerning the implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what consultations he has had with voluntary organisations in Wales concerning the regulations to be made under section 1 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(5) what representations he has received from voluntary organisations in Wales concerning the implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Voluntary organisations representing people with disabilities and their carers in Wales have often expressed their understandable desire for early implementation of the remaining sections of the Act, but the Government have consistently said that the remaining sections can be implemented only when the necessary resources have been identified and can be made available.

The Welsh Counties Committee (now known as the Assembly of Welsh Counties) and directors of social services in Wales were asked earlier this year to provide detailed estimates of the additional costs likely to arise as a result of implementation of sections 1, 2, 3, 8(2) and 8(3) of the Act, but we have still to receive several of those estimates.

When those estimates are to hand, they will be discussed with local authorities and further consideration will then be given to possible timetables for implementation.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what research he has undertaken on the implementation by local authorities in Wales of sections 4, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he make a statement;

(2) what assessment he has made of how local authorities in Wales are fulfilling their duties under the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The social services inspectorate of the Welsh Office, in its programme of surveys and inspections, is mindful of the requirements of the Act and reports to me on its findings. The required services and arrangements are not yet fully developed, but I am satisfied that authorities are making genuine endeavours to fulfil their duties under the Act.

AIDS

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the cumulative totals on 31 December 1987, 30 June 1988, 31 December 1988, 30 June 1989, 31 December 1989 and 30 June 1990 of (a) people who have died with AIDS, (b) people with AIDS including those who have died and (c) HIV antibody-positive persons in Wales (i) by patient characteristic and (ii) in total.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is as follows:

People who have died with AIDS

	Number
31 December 1987	14
30 June 1988	16
31 December 1988	20
30 June 1989	26
31 December 1989	34
30 June 1990	38
People with AIDS including those who have died
31 December 1987	18
30 June 1988	27
31 December 1988	34
30 June 1989	37
31 December 1989	48
30 June 1990	57

	Number
HIV antibody-positive persons—cumulative total
31 December 1987	67
30 June 1988	113
31 December 1988	121
30 June 1989	131
31 December 1989	149
30 June 1990	171

A breakdown of the number of HIV antibody-positive persons by patient characteristic is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Needle Exchange Schemes

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many needle exchange schemes are currently operating in each district health authority area in Wales.

Mr. Grist: With the exception of Pembrokeshire, all district health authorities in Wales operate a needle exchange scheme. A number of these schemes involve more than one location within the district.

Social Care

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will issue instructions to the nine health authorities to suspend all closure proposals for geriatric and mental handicap and mental illness hospitals, pending the full implementation in April 1993 of his care in the community proposals.

Mr. Grist: Such closures take place now, and I see no reason why they should not continue in the usual planned way.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations with the chairmen of the health authorities in Wales he proposes on geriatric care hospitals, pursuant to his written answer of 18 July on social care and related health services.

Mr. Grist: It is for health authorities and local authorities to liaise to ensure proper integration in the delivery of their services.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he now proposes with (a) the director of social services, (b) the voluntary agencies representing carers and the elderly and (c) the nursing and medical professions, pursuant to his written answer of 18 July on social care and related health services.

Mr. Grist: The well-established arrangements for consultation with all appropriate agencies will continue.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional consultation procedures he proposes arising from his written answer of 18 July on the introduction of full care in the community to deal with closure proposals for hospitals housing the elderly.

Mr. Grist: The well-established arrangements for consultation with all appropriate bodies will continue.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he now proposes to meet the Welsh Counties Committee regarding the delayed implementation of the care in the community proposals.

Mr. Grist: Our officials have written to the Assembly of Welsh Counties, as the former committee is now known, on this matter.

Prescribing

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of all the professional publications his Department has provided to national health service doctors containing advice about drug prescribing, together with any departmental cover letters sent with such documents;

(2) if he will list the specific circulars, documents and advice notes issued by his Department over the past 10 years in respect of (a) over-prescribing and (b) under-prescribing; and if he will place copies of all such documents in the Library.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Health on 16 July. The same range of publications is provided to national health service doctors in Wales at an annual cost to the Welsh Office of around £180,000. Copies of the documents referred to are already in the Library.

Health Authority Lending

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he approved, either in principle or in detail the £500,000 loan from South Glamorgan health authority to Gwynedd health authority in 1990-91.

Mr. Grist: I am not aware that the South Glamorgan health authority has entered into an arrangement to lend money to any health authority in 1990-91. However, in 1989-90 South Glamorgan health authority made available £0·5 million to Gwynedd health authority under normal inter-year cash management arrangements. The loan was mutually agreed by the two authorities and the Department made the necessary cash limit adjustments to give effect to the loan and to its repayment in the current financial year.

High Schools (Redundancies)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning the number of staff redundancies in high schools in Wales since 1 January 1989.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Local Education Authorities in Wales reported 42 premature retirements on the grounds of redundancy in the period 1 January 1989 to 30 June 1990 amongst secondary school teachers.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when his consultation paper on the operation of the standard community charge and other matters will be made available in (a) the Vote Office and (b) the Library.

Mr. David Hunt: The Document "The Standard Community Charge and other matters—A consultation paper for Wales" has already been sent to Members representing Welsh constituencies, to the Vote Office, and to the Library of the House.

General Practice

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the statistical indicators collected and maintained by the Welsh Office in relation to family practitioner services and general practice in Wales.

Mr. Grist: A set of FPS service indicators, which embraces currently the items listed as follows, has been developed and is maintained by the Welsh Office and the Department of Health. This is supplied to family practitioner committees in Wales and is used by them and by the Department for management purposes. A review of the range and content of the indicators is in progress.

A selection of the current set of FPS service indicators is published in "Key Statistical Indicators for National Health Services Management in Wales", No. 8, 1989, a copy of which is in the Library.

FPS Service Indicators

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Ground: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was (i) the net rate and (ii) the grant-borne expenditure of the London borough of Hounslow in each year since 1978-79 (a) as estimated and (b) in the outturn.

Mr. Chope: The available information, as returned by the London borough of Hounslow is as follows:

Local rate income and expenditure

£ million

	Budget		Outturn
	Local rate income[1]	Expenditure[2]	Local rate income[1]	Expenditure[2]
1980-81	36·6	75·1	41·2	78·7
1981-82	56·4	84·7	58·0	84·6
1982-83	51·4	89·1	51·6	85·2
1983-84	56·4	91·2	57·3	91·2
1984-85	67·7	92·7	67·7	93·7
1985-86	77·5	98·0	79·0	90·8
1986-87	98·3	119·3	n.a.	n.a.
1987-88	100·2	111·9	103·3	126·4
1988-89	108·8	127·9	112·6	141·1
1989-90	117·2	160·9	n.a.	n.a.

n.a.—Not available.
[1] Rate income gross of rebates but net of domestic rate relief grant.
[2] Expenditure funded by rates, grants and balances.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the revenue support grant for 1990-91, expressed as a sum per head of population, for (a) Nottinghamshire, including its constituent districts, (b) the City of Westminster and (c) Wandsworth.

Mr. Chope: The average revenue support grant for 1990-91, expressed as an amount per adult for Nottinghamshire districts is £201·78. The figure for the City of Westminster is £865·84 and for Wandsworth £572·27.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what allowances are made for providing local government services to Heathrow airport when calculating the standard spending assessments of the relevant councils.

Mr. Chope: Standard spending assessments measure the cost of providing a standard level of service. They make no specific allowance for the cost of providing services to airports, such as Heathrow. But the assessments for the relevant authorities for police, highway maintenance and other services, which includes environmental health, will reflect the policing needs of the airport and the other demands imposed by visitors and the working population.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to amend or alter the factors used to arrive at local authorities' standard spending assessments for 1990-91.

Mr. Chope: No.

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) on what date he intends to announce the standard spending assessments for borough councils for the next financial year;

(2) if he has decided whether to give additional weight to the value of tourism in Torbay's standard spending assessment for the next financial year.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend will announce his proposals for standard spending assessments in the autumn.

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how up to date the statistics relating to the proportion of elderly in particular boroughs, that he will use when calculating the standard spending assessments for the next financial year, will be.

Mr. Chope: We intend to use estimates of the resident population at 30 June 1989, prepared by the registrar general, as the source for the proportion of the elderly in each relevant authority. These will be the latest available estimates compiled on a consistent basis across all authorities.

Community Charge

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will take steps to give relief to those who enter residential nursing accommodation but experience delay in selling their homes thereby incurring liability for a standard community charge.

Mr. Chope: We have already prescribed that no standard charge is payable where less than 12 months has elapsed since the date on which a patient became solely or mainly resident in a hospital, residential care home, nursing home, mental nursing home or hostel. We have proposed that from 1 April 1991 this limit should be removed.

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will end the liability of executors of wills for a standard charge on the home of someone who has died.

Mr. Chope: We have already prescribed that no standard charge is payable on unoccupied property where the person subject is acting in his capacity as personal representative, and with respect to which either no grant of probate or letters of administration has been made, or less than three months have elapsed since either of those events. We have proposed that this period should be extended to six months as from 1 April 1991.

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to exclude non-working mothers from the community charge.

Mr. Chope: I have nothing to add to the statement made by my right hon. Friend on 19 July.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he will introduce legislation to prevent charging authorities from using community charge information for purposes that are not directly relevant to the management or collection of the community charge; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) whether he will introduce legislation to prevent a community charge registration office or charging authority from disclosing community charge information for purposes that are not directly relevant to the management or collection of the community charge; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him of 5 February 1990 at column 429.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for regulations concerning the disclosure of anonymous poll tax data; what advice he intends to give to community charges registration officers on how to ensure that the identity of individuals is guaranteed; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I have nothing to add to the answer that I gave the hon. Member on 15 January 1990, at column 100.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will introduce regulations to prevent the disclosure of information by charging authorities, whenever the information disclosed relates to community charge debts and the recipients of information are not acting as agents of the authority with respect to debt recovery; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: No such regulations are necessary. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him of 15 January 1990, at column 99.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average community charge bill in Great Britain net of transitional relief.

Mr. Chope: The figure is £342; charge capping is expected to reduce this to £337.

New Properties (Water Rates)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements he has for assessing the rateable values of newly built properties for water rate purposes; what is his estimate of the number of staff employed in England for this purpose and their cost; and whether the water plcs, central Government or local authorities meet these costs.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: There is no need for such arrangements. For all newly built domestic properties, water companies are charging on bases other than rateable value. If a water company has decided to use rateable value for the time being as the basis for charging in the case of newly built non-domestic properties, rateable values for those properties will in any case have been assessed for the purpose of the uniform business rate.

Right to Buy

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent estimate he has made of the number of council properties sold under the Government's right-to-buy scheme since 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Between October 1980, when the right-to-buy legislation came into effect, and March 1990, about 970,000 tenants purchased their homes from English local authorities and new towns under this scheme.

Toxic Sites

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in making toxic sites safe; what methods are to be used; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: In so far as the question relates to landfill sites receiving toxic waste, the licensing provisions of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 require waste disposal authorities to satisfy themselves initially that there are no risks of water pollution or public health dangers and to supervise licensed activities to ensure that this continues to be the case. Authorities have powers to carry out remedial work, should that be necessary, and to recover costs, but there are no central records of such action.

In so far as the question relates to problems of contaminated land, such sites need to be made safe by landowners to ensure that there are no risks to public health or liabilities arising from use of the site. The National Rivers Authority have powers under the Water Act 1989 to take remedial or preventive action in relation to risks of water pollution and to recover costs. The Government provides guidance notes on monitoring, assessment and treatment of contaminants and a wide variety of treatment methods can be adopted, but there are no central records of work undertaken.

Local Authority Estates

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many estates owned by local authorities have held ballots to opt out of local authority control under the Housing Act 1988.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Ballots under the tenants' choice provisions of the Housing Act 1988 are conducted when the alternative landlord has made a formal offer to tenants. Two tenants' choice applications have been made to acquire property, but neither of these has reached the stage of the ballot.

The Housing Corporation is carrying out preliminary tests of tenant opinion in a further 12 areas.

House Demolition

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has now received to his Department's consultation paper about the demolition of houses; and if he he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Responses to the Department's consultation paper "Planning Permission: Demolition of Houses" were invited by 25 June. Over 160 responses have been received. The Government will announce their conclusions when they have been fully analysed.

Furnished Tenancies

Mr. Solely: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures for rents for furnished tenancies on the same basis as those shown in table 8.11 of the public expenditure White Paper, Cm. 1008.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Average registered fair rents for non-housing association furnished tenancies in England are as follows:

	£ per week
1984	24·58
1985	26·62
1986	29·38
1987	30·96
1988	36·06
1989	38·56

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures for rents for private tenancies by region.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The available information is for fair rents registered under the Rent Act 1977 (as amended), or housing benefit cases referred to rent officers under section 121 of the Housing Act 1988.

1989	Registered Rents			Housing Benefit Referrals[1]

Radon Gas

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will extend the practical guidance given in building regulations on dealing with anti-radon measures in new homes.

Mr. Chope: My Department will shortly be issuing a consultation paper containing proposals for the revision of the requirements and guidance relating to part C of the Building Regulations 1985. This will include the latest guidance on the special measures which should be taken when new houses are being constructed in Cornwall and in parts of Devon particularly at risk from radon. We have asked the National Radiological Protection Board to provide further advice which will enable decisions to be taken on other areas where such measures need to be taken.

Local Councils (Planning Powers)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to seek to upgrade the responsibilities and duties of town and parish councils in respect of planning issues.

Mr. Moynihan: Statutory consultation procedures already provide an opportunity for town and parish councils to contribute to the preparation of development plans. Those councils also have a statutory power (paragraph 20 of schedule 16 to the Local Government Act 1972) to require the district council for their area to keep them informed about planning applications it receives. Where such a requirement is made, and the councils make representations about an application, they have the right to appear at any public inquiry held to consider that application or a related appeal. There are no proposals at present to extend these arrangements.

Local Councils (Maladministration)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to seek to widen the powers of the local government ombudsman to include investigations of alleged maladministration by town and parish councils.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No. Local government electors can raise the actions of town and parish councils directly at town and parish meetings.

Derelict Land

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total area of land redeemed from dereliction in each region of the United Kingdom during the last seven years; what is the present area of dereliction in each region; and by how much the area of dereliction has changed within each region.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested is not available. However, the survey of derelict land in England in 1988 shows the following changes in the area of derelict land in England between 1982 and 1988.

Derelict land in England 1982-1988

Hectares

Standard Region	Area of derelict land at 1 April 1982	Area of derelict land at 1 April 1988	Net decrease/ increase	Area reclaimed 1 April 1982— 1 April 1988
North	7,307	5,945	−1,362	2,472
North West	10,042	8,823	−1,219	3,671
Yorkshire and Humberside	5,431	6,145	714	2,055
West Midlands	5,787	5,575	−212	2,279
East Midlands	5,198	4,407	−791	1,586
East Anglia	804	593	−211	182
South West	6,635	5,827	−808	667
South East[1]	2,525	1,794	−731	607
Greater London	1,954	1,386	−568	494
England	45,683	40,495	−5,188	14,013

[1] Excluding Greater London.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums from the European structural fund have been devoted since 1986 to the clearance of dereliction in South Yorkshire; and what action he is taking to ensure that this level of support is significantly measured.

Mr. Moynihan: Information is not readily available for schemes approved by the European Commission under the previous ERDF Regulations. No schemes for clearance of dereliction have been approved under the Yorkshire and Humberside steel area integrated development operation or the resider and non-quota measures for steel areas.

Water and Sewerage Undertakers

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will give for each water and sewerage undertaker, which plans he has approved with modifications, pursuant to paragraph 2(2) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989;

(2) if, for each water and sewerage undertaker, he will list the dates on which the undertakers submitted their plans, pursuant to paragraph 2(2) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989;

(3) if he will give for each water and sewerage undertaker, which plans he has approved without modifications, pursuant to paragraph 2(2) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989;

(4) if he will place in the Library copies of the plans submitted to him by each water and sewerage undertaker, pursuant to paragraph 2(2) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989;

(5) if he will give for each water and sewerage undertaker the form in which he has prescribed the reports shall be submitted, pursuant to paragraph 2(2) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The former water authorities prepared and submitted plans progressively, under letters of direction issued in 1983, until 1986. Undertakers are currently reviewing these plans, following the 1989 direction. In addition, plans for expenditure each year on the provision or purchase of facilities and equipment are submitted to the Department for approval, with modifications if necessary. It is neither in the interests of national security nor commercial confidentiality to provide the further information requested.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, for each water and sewerage undertaker, he will list the land he has specified, pursuant to paragraph 3(2) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Paragraph 3(2) does not refer to land. It would not be in the interests of national security to give the information requested in relation to paragraph 3(1).

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether, having regard to the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations 1983 and section 3 of the emergency planning guidance to local authorities, the duty to consult other water and sewerage undertakers, pursuant to paragraph 5(1) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989 is to be extended to local authorities with civil defence functions under regulation 4 of the 1983 regulations; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether, having regard to the Civil Defence (Fire Services) (Water) Regulations 1956, the duty to consult other water and sewerage undertakers, pursuant to paragraph 5(1) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989 is to be extended to fire authorities; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will give for each water and sewerage undertaker the extent to which he has required their plans, operations, facilities and services to be complementary and co-ordinated, pursuant to paragraph 5(1) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Extension of paragraph 5(1) of the Direction as suggested is not considered necessary. Responsibility for ensuring the co-ordination of water undertakers' civil defence planning in peacetime is delegated to Chief Regional Water Co-ordinators.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if for each water and sewerage undertaker he will list the number of employees he has required to be made available (a) as regional co-ordinators and (b) in such other capacity as he has required and in what capacity, pursuant to paragraph 5(2) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has appointed chief regional water co-ordinators, deputy chief regional water co-ordinators and further regional water co-ordinators for the various home defence regions. The numbers of employees made available by undertakers to fulfil these roles are as follows:

Water undertaker	Number of employees
Anglian Water Services Ltd.	8
North West Water Ltd.	6
Northumbrian Water Ltd.	2
The Newcastle and Gateshead Water Co.	1
Severn Trent Water Ltd.	9
Southern Water Services Ltd.	4
South West Water Services Ltd.	3
Thames Water Utilities Ltd.	8
Wessex Water Services Ltd.	3
Yorkshire Water Services Ltd.	3

There has been no requirement to make employees available in any other capacity pursuant to paragraph 5(2) of the direction.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if, for each water and sewerage undertaker, he will list the dates on which the undertakers reported to him, pursuant to paragraph 6(1) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989;

(2) if he will place in the Library copies of the reports submitted to him on or before 1 April, pursuant to paragraph 6(1) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989;

(3) if, for each water and sewerage undertaker, he will give the form in which he has prescribed their reports shall be submitted, pursuant to paragraph 6(2) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989;

(4) if, for each water and sewerage undertaker, he will give the losses which it has sustained by reason of compliance with the direction, pursuant to paragraph 6(2) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The chief regional water co-ordinators have submitted at various dates reports on action taken pursuant to the direction. It is not in the interests of national security to provide details. Information on the losses sustained by each undertaker in complying with the direction is subject to the normal rules of commercial confidentiality.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what general policy in respect of civil defence he has notified to the water and sewerage undertakers, pursuant to paragraph 2(1)(a) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989; and if he will place a copy in the Library;

(2) what guidance, procedures and requirements have been notified to the water sewerage undertakers by him, pursuant to paragraph 2(1)(b) of the Security Measures (Water and Sewerage Undertakers) Direction 1989; and if he will place copies in the Library.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Water and sewerage undertakers were told that Government policy would be one of minimum change following the introduction of section 170 of the Water Act 1989. But current policy is under discussion following recent international developments. General policy had been set out in the Civil Defence Manual for Water Services and section 12 of the Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities. A copy of the latter document is already available in the Library. I will be placing in the Library a copy of "National Security Measures in the Water Industry: Notes for Guidance of Water Undertakers and Sewerage Undertakers on Grant (with effect from 10 October 1989)".

Falconers

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown of the species of birds that falconers were licensed to set birds of prey on in 1989; what criteria a falconer must fulfil before being issued with a licence; what are the terms and conditions of the licence issued for a bird of prey to be set on a blackbird; and how many licences have been issued to date in 1990.

Mr. Trippier: In 1989, the Department issued licences to falconers to fly birds of prey at the following species: blackbird, skylark, black-headed gull, song thrush, mistle thrush, redwing, fieldfare and meadow pipit. Before a licence is issued, falconers must identify the bird of prey they intend to fly and specify the number and species of their proposed quarry and the county in which they will be taken.

Licences are subject to conditions restricting them to the period 1 September to 28 February, imposing a limit of 50 on the number of quarry which may be killed; requiring that the bird of prey to which the licence refers is properly ringed and registered, and requiring that a return showing the birds killed be made by 31 March.

To date, two licences have been issued this year.

Planning Application Fees

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to compensate local authorities for loss of income against forecasts due to the lack of any increase in planning application fees.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. It would not be appropriate to provide compensation for any shortfall against any authority's own forecasts.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will next increase planning application fees for local planning authorities.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I will make an announcement shortly.

Extraction Licences

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to review the role of the Crown Estates Commission in the granting of extraction licences.

Mr. Moynihan: The Secretary of State has no plans to review the role of the Crown Estate in the granting of extraction licences. The Government view procedure for determining marine dredging production licences was reviewed recently following public consultation in 1988 and the revised procedure published in May 1989.

Homelessness

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the £15 million announced on 22 June to help single homeless people is allocated for a rent deposit fund.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Decisions have yet to be taken on the balance of the package. Discussions are currently taking place between my Department, housing associations, the voluntary sector and local authorities about how to make the best use of the resources.

Stoke Park, Guildford

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will call in for public inquiry the application to build a sports and leisure complex in Stoke Park, Guildford.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend considered requests that he should call in the application for outline permission in June 1988 when the borough council decided to proceed with the scheme. He considered that the issues raised were local ones and not such as to justify his intervention. That remains his view in respect of any other related applications for the provision of a sports and leisure complex on this site.

Television Cables

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what regulations govern the installation of cable television lines above ground in (a) national parks, (b) areas of outstanding natural beauty, (c) areas of great landscape value and (d) conservation areas.

Mr. Moynihan: Operators of local broad band cable systems are licensed by the Department of Trade and Industry and benefit from the permitted development rights set out in Part 24 of the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1988. In addition, their licences restrict the manner and circumstances in which different forms of development may be undertaken. These conditions relate in particular to the placing of overhead wires and poles, and help provide for the protection of particularly sensitive areas such as national parks, AONBs, conservation areas etc. by requiring consultation with or the agreement of local planning authorities and others before apparatus is installed.

Green Belt, Brentwood

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment pursuant to his answer of 20 June Official Report, column 568, if the Brentwood district council local plan which provides for a change of designation from green belt to that of an employment area meets the exceptional circumstances to which he referred.

Mr. Moynihan: Brentwood district council has not as yet published its draft local plan for public consultation, prior to placing it on formal deposit, it is during those stages and any subsequent local public inquiry that there will be opportunities to consider whether any proposed changes to the green belt are justified.

Extraction Licences

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps are being taken to ensure the conditions of extraction licences are complied with.

Mr. Moynihan: The Crown Estate, which grants the extraction licence, monitors the conditions that the Secretary of State has imposed when a favourable Government view has been given. If the Secretary of State is advised that such conditions are not adhered to, he can review the provision of the Government view and in some circumstances the Crown Estate could withdraw the licence.

DEFENCE

Aldermaston A-90 Building

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes to the original programme of work have been made during the construction of the Aldermaston A-90 building.

Mr. Neubert: Changes to the programme of work for the A90 building at AWE Aldermaston were made as a result of the Government's decision to purchase the Trident system and in response to subsequent programme slippage. I refer the hon. Member to appendix 4 of the July 1987 report by the Comptroller and Auditor General—

"Control and Management of the Trident Programme" —HC27. The construction of A90 is now complete and equipment installation is proceeding within the scheduled time scale for Trident.

Warships (Satellite Communication Terminals)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current number of satellite communication terminals available for use by frigates or destroyers in the Royal Navy.

Mr. Neubert: Twenty-six satellite communications terminals are available for use by Royal Navy destroyers and frigates. Plans exist to fit the terminals to all Royal Navy destroyers and frigates.

Hypox Deck Flooring

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report those frigates and destroyers in the Royal Navy fitted with Hypox deck flooring; and if he will separately distinguish the percentage of the total deck area covered in those vessels so fitted.

Mr. Neubert: Hypox was introduced into service in 1988 as an internal deck covering primarily for passages and wet spaces, which together comprise some 25 per cent. of the internal deck area of warships. It is used as appropriate as an alternative to linoleum and painted deck finishes. It is fitted on an opportunity basis, for example during refits, when existing deck surfaces are beyond repair. Material of this type is being fitted progressively in new frigates.

The actual amount fitted thus varies considerably from ship to ship and details of the amounts in individual ships are not available.

Lynx Helicopters (Radar System)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give consideration to updating the radar system on Royal Navy Lynx helicopters to give a 360 degrees scanning facility.

Mr. Neubert: We regularly assess proposals to maintain and enhance the effectiveness of the equipment available to the armed forces, taking into account a variety of factors, including the potential threat and the resources available. All our requirements are, therefore, subject to revision in the light of circumstance. We do not at present have any plans to update the Lynx radar system.

Low Flying

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the deployments of Skyguard radar to monitor low-flying exercises in the United Kingdom since October 1989; and if he will make a statement on the number and nature of any breaches of low-flying regulations that were detected.

Mr. Neubert: Since October 1989, the Skyguard system has been deployed to the following areas to monitor low flying:

North East England and Borders area
(Exercise Mallet Blow)—27 to 29 March 1990.
Shepton Mallet area—9 to 13 July 1990.

No breaches of low-flying regulations were substantiated during the March deployment. The results of the July deployment are still awaited.

RAF Leuchars (Noise)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the results of the recent noise survey carried out in the vicinity of RAF Leuchars indicate that an extension of the noise insulation scheme would be required to bring all properties suffering from excessive noise within its ambit.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The results show that further properties are subject to the qualifying level of noise for the payment of noise insulation grants.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the results of the noise survey recently carried out in the vicinity of RAF Leuchars.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes. In accordance with established practice, this will coincide with the announcement of a revised noise compensation scheme.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to extend the area covered by the noise insulation scheme in the vicinity of RAF Leuchars; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces intends to authorise an extension of the area of entitlement to noise insulation grants as soon as resources are available. The funding position is being monitored closely and my noble Friend will, in any event, be reviewing the situation towards the end of 1990.

RAF Greenham Common

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many persons have been removed from RAF Greenham Common since 12 July.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Members of the public were escorted from RAF Greenham Common on 128 occasions between 12 and 22 July 1990. This figure does not refer to 128 different people as many individuals have been escorted from the base on more than one occasion.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current policy of the Ministry of Defence police towards members of the public walking within the confines of the perimeter fence at RAF Greenham Common.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: RAF Greenham Common is Ministry of Defence property and there is no general right of access to it. The current policy of the Ministry of Defence police towards members of the public walking within the confines of the perimeter fence at the station is that trespassers who have committed no criminal damage will be escorted from the site, while persons who are suspected to having committed an offence, for example criminal damage, will be arrested and charged accordingly. The police wil not prevent the valid exercise of commoners' rights by those who are entitled to do so.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many arrests there have been within the confines of the perimeter fence at RAF Greenham Common since 12 July.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There were 16 arrests within the confines of the perimeter fence at RAF Greenham Common between 12 and 22 July, all in connection with instances of criminal damage.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if members of the public found within the confines of the perimeter fence at RAF Greenham Common are requested to leave before being placed into Ministry of Defence police vehicles.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is Ministry of Defence policy that members of the public found within the confines of the perimeter fence at RAF Greenham Common are requested to leave before being escorted off the base. For their own safety, trespassers are always taken to the base exit in MOD vehicles if it is beyond reasonable walking distance.

Regimental Running Costs

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the average annual running costs of (a) the Life Guards, (b) the Blues and Royals, (c) the Grenadier Guards, (d) the Coldstream Guards, (e) the Scots Guards, (f) the Irish Guards and (g) the Welsh Guards.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Information regarding the running costs of individual units is not held centrally and could be provided only with disproportionate time and effort.

Uniforms

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards the wearing of service uniforms by civilians for commercial purposes.

Mr. Neubert: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. Member.

Eastern Europe

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what re-assessment has been made of the threat as a result of the Soviet troop withdrawals from Hungary and Czechoslovakia that have been made so far.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Soviet withdrawals from Hungary and Czechoslovakia are well under way and are expected to be completed by mid-1991. We keep all threat assessments under review.

Equipment

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply of 2 May, Official Report, column 602, whether his Department classifies (a) tank transmissions, (b) tank engine spare parts, (c) military avionics equipment, (d) encoding equipment, (e) military radars and (f) military optical equipment as non-lethal defence equipment.

Mr. Alan Clark: Yes.

Noise Regulations

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has issued any exemption certificates from the Noise at Work Regulations 1989 to (a) Her Majesty's forces and (b) visiting forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No certificates of exemption have been issued by my right hon. Friend under the Noise at Work Regulations 1989, either to Her Majesty's forces or any visiting force.

Expenditure Reductions

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply of 12 June, Official Report, column 142, when he expects the work currently in progress to assess the possibility of altering the readiness of British military forces will be completed; and what expenditure reductions he estimates will be possible as a result of this work.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: SHAPE's review of the criteria govering the readiness and availability of alliance forces is not expected to be concluded for some time yet. Some interim measures, the details of which are classified, have already been implemented. It is too early to estimate what expenditure reductions may be possible as a result of this work.

Ceremonial Duties

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what amount of time (a) the Life Guards, (b) Blues and Royals, (c) the 1 Battalion Grenadier Guards, (d) the 2 Battalion Grenadier Guards, (e) the 1 Battalion Coldstream Guards, (f) the 2 Battalion Coldstream Guards, (g) the 1 Battalion Scots Guards, (h) the 2 Battalion Scots Guards, (f) the Irish Guards and (g) the Welsh Guards have spent on ceremonial duties in each year for the last 10 years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Disproportionate effort would be required to identify actual periods spent on ceremonial duties by these units for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what communications take place between his Department and the London tourist board regarding the ceremonial duties of the Guards division.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There is regular contact with the London tourist board on the ceremonial duties of the Household Division including the provision of forecasts of events and press releases.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the approximate value of one Guards ceremonial uniform.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The cost of ceremonial uniform varies. For example, the uniform for a guardsman of a foot Guards regiment costs approximately £970 whilst that of a trooper of the Household Cavalry mounted regiment costs about £4,450.

Service Catering

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether British meat is provided in service establishments.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes.

HEALTH

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what basis the Medicines Control Agency is obliged to recover all its running costs.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Evans Cunliffe report, a copy of which is available in the Library, on the control of medicines recommended inter alia that the full cost of the regulation of medicines should be recovered from industry.

This was one of the recommendations which Ministers accepted and the effect of this on fees was explained in the Department's consultative letter of 22 December 1988 (MLX 175) a copy of which is available in the Library.

I also refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 6 June at column 629.

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what activity study of the Medicines Control Agency has recently been carried out; and if he will publish the results.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A confidential activity analysis of the Medicines Control Agency was recently carried out by independent consultants. The information is being used in the current review of the Medicines Control Agency's fee structure.

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Medicines Control Agency is presently subject to exemption from gross running costs control.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Medicines Control Agency—MCA—was approved for exemption from 1989-90 on the basis that the necessary information systems would be introduced that year. However, the MCA has experienced greater difficulty than anticipated in putting those systems into effect, and therefore the operation of the exemption attributes relating to its expenditure has been suspended temporarily, pending review in the current public expenditure survey. Under these temporary arrangements any increase in the MCA's gross expenditure as well as the funding of such an increase is required to be discussed and agreed with Treasury. In the meantime, the MCA has been working to meet the requirements for restoration of full exemption from gross running cost control and has continued to plan the restructuring of its fee income on the basis that the full exemption will be restored.

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the reasons for the difference between the figure given in the supply estimates for 1990-91 for the expenditure of the Medicines Control Agency and that quoted in his Department's letter to the hon. Member for Erewash of 6 April.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The expenditure and income figures given in the supply estimates for 1990-91 represent payments and estimated receipts of cash voted and required for the operational costs of the Medicines Control Agency during the financial year 1990-91. Voted provision includes capital expenditure but excludes payments to the civil superannuation vote. The figures quoted in the Department's letter of 6 April are derived from accrual accounting and take into account depreciation, notional staff insurance, superannuation costs as well as interest on capital employed, and so on.

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether it is open to the Medicines Control Agency to charge fees based on turnover.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave my hon. Friend on 6 June at column 629.

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what circumstances he envisages using the powers granted under the Health and Medicines Act 1988 to charge fees based on turnover through the Medicines Control Agency.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 21 May 1990 at column 630. Section 21 of the Health and Medicines Act clarified the basis under which regulations could be made in relation to an annual fee and also validated the basis on which previous annual fees had been charged. Any such proposals would be preceded by full consultation as is required under Section 129(6) of the Medicines Act 1968.

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether Treasury guidelines cover the inclusion of work connected with the European Communities in those activities of the Medicines Control Agency of which the costs are to be met by licence fees.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No Treasury guidelines have been issued specifically referring to EC work and the Medicines Control Agency. The rules which govern the factors to be taken into account in fixing fees under the Medicines Act 1971 are set out in the Medicines (Fixing of Fees Relating to Medicinal Products for Human Use) Order 1989 (SI 1989 No. 684) a copy of which is available in the Library.

Schedule 1 to that order sets out the functions which are to be taken into account in fixing fees under the 1971 Act, and schedule 2 details the matters to be taken into account in determining the cost of those functions. In relation to EC work I refer my hon. Friend to paragraphs 5 and 10(b) of schedule 1 and paragraph 1 of schedule 2.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what further steps are being taken further to educate the general public about the risks of AIDS.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We are fully committed to taking effective action to prevent the spread of HIV in all sections of the United Kingdom population. In the absence of a vaccine against HIV infection or a cure for AIDS, public education remains the cornerstone in our strategy and we continue to spend more on AIDS health education than on any other single health education programme.

The expert symposium convened by the United Kingdom Health Departments and the Health Education Authority on 24 November 1989 was successful in keeping this issue before the public and in providing a sound scientific basis for further campaign work at all levels about this serious threat to public health.

The Health Education Authority has already launched an effective TV and press campaign building on the conclusions reached at the symposium. The HEA is developing further campaign material and has also launched a campaign to warn young holidaymakers about the risks of casual sex while away from home. Targeted work aimed at influencing the behaviour of specific groups will also continue including among those whose activities may place them at particular risks of HIV infection.

To support this work we have encouraged health authorities to work with other statutory and voluntary agencies to develop local programmes for HIV prevention and have made new money available for this. We have also asked health authorities to appoint HIV prevention co-ordinators to spearhead this work and to pay particular attention to developing genito-urinary medicine and drug misuse services because of the crucial part both must play in HIV prevention.

We are also committed to continued support for the national AIDS helpline which acts as a valuable resource in support of our public education work.

We are determined to make further progress in the area of women and AIDS. This will be the theme of World AIDS Day 1990 on 1 December. Women have a central role in preventing the spread of HIV as health educators, carers and mothers.

We will continue to give high priority to HIV prevention and to ensure that health authorities and the health professions bring this into the mainstream of their work.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the cumulative totals on 31 December 1987, 30 June 1988, 31 December 1988, 30 June 1989, 31 December 1989 and 30 June 1990 of (a) people who have died with AIDS, (b) people with AIDS including those who have died and (c) HIV antibody positive persons (i) in England by patient characteristic, (ii) in the United Kingdom by patient characteristic, (iii) in each of the regional health authority areas in England, (iv) in total in England and (v) in total in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information is not available in the specific form requested and special analyses to obtain this could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The hon. Member might find it helpful to see the AIDS HIV quarterly surveillance tables produced by the public health laboratory service AIDS centre and communicable diseases Scotland unit. These contain detailed data on HIV and AIDS surveillance. Copies will be placed in the Library.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his assessment of the annual cost to the national health service arising from the treatment of a patient suffering from AIDS.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Spending on care for AIDS patients is not separately identified. This year, £127·5 million has been made available to health authorities in England as a contribution towards the costs of work to prevent the spread of HIV infection and the provision of diagnostic, treatment, care and support services for people infected with the virus, including those with AIDS.

Respite Care

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his policy on the need for provision of respite care in the proposals for community care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Respite care has an important part to play both in supporting carers and enabling dependent people to continue living in the community. Local authorities already have power to arrange short term admissions to care for this purpose. It is for the authority concerned to decide what facilities to provide in individual cases, taking account of the views of the person concerned and their carers.

Authorities are required to charge for residential care they provide or arrange but have discretion to limit the charge payable in the first eight weeks of any admission to the statutory minimum—currently £37·50 a week.

Disabled People

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what responses he has received from the local authority associations to his Department's letter of 19 February regarding the implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mr. Dorrell: We received a response dated 4 July setting out the associations' initial thoughts and suggesting a meeting on 12 July. This meeting was subsequently postponed at the request of the associations.

NHS Reforms

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the progress of the implementation of reforms to the national health service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Progress on the implementation of the reforms set out in the White Paper "Working for Patients" is proceeding according to plan. The number of formal applications received so far from hospitals and units to become National Health Service trusts is 58. We expect about 400 GP practices are likely to undertake preparatory work to become fund holders in April 1991. So far, there have been about 150 expressions of interest to hold practice funds in 1992-93. It would not be practicable to phase in all the proposals set out in the White Paper "Caring for People" from the same date, but we will begin to implement them from 1 April 1991.

NHS Trusts

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the total amount of interest-bearing debts facing proposed self-governing hospital trusts which is now to be written off.

Mr. Dorrell: None of the potential NHS trusts have any interest bearing debts at present. When an NHS trust is set up it will be given an originating capital debt. Part of this debt will bear interest and will have to be repaid; as will interest bearing loans which a trust takes out to finance its activities. There are no plans to write off these debts or loans.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what restraint will apply to national health service trust hospitals to avoid pre-empting public sector borrowing requirement assumptions for national health service capital spending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: NHS trusts' borrowing for capital spending will be constrained by the size of their external financing limits. These will be set annually for each trust taking account of its forward business plan and available resources.

Family Planning

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will bring forward proposals to improve family planning services.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth East (Mr. Atkinson) on 19 June at column 508 and on 27 June at columns 249-50.

Community Care

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that assessments of possible need for social care are carried out by local authority staffs before a patient is discharged from hospital, so that continued in-patient treatment can be offered if no appropriate care outside hospital is available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Health authorities, in conjunction with local authorities, are already responsible for developing individual discharge plans that ensure a continuity of health and social care. The existing circulars on hospital discharges—HC(89)5 and LAC(89)7—copies of which are available in the Library, instruct health authorities to start planning for discharge at as early a stage as possible, giving local authorities adequate notice to assess and provide for social care needs.

Mentally Ill People

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were discharged from mental illness hospitals for the latest available year (a) in total, (b) in under one month, (c) in under three months and (d) in under six months.

Mr. Dorrell: The information available centrally is given in the following table. The number of discharges is greater than the number of patients treated as some will be admitted more than once in a year.

Discharges by duration of stay 1987-88
Mental illness specialty

	Number
Total discharges	181,400
Length of stay
Less than one month	117,960
One month or more but less than three months	45,250
Six months or more but less than one year	14,250

Mental Health Act Commission

Mr. Kirkhope: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has yet responded to the third biennial report of the Mental Health Act Commission.

Mr. Dorrell: I have today written to Mr. Louis Blom-Cooper QC, chairman of the Mental Health Act Commission, thanking the commission for all the excellent work over the period 1987 to 1989 summarised in its third biennial report, which my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State laid before the House on 14 December 1989. I also included with my letter more detailed papers produced in the Department of Health, Home Office, Welsh Office and Department of Social Security responding to a number of specific points made in the report. The chairman of the Special Hospitals Service Authority has also written to the chairman of the Mental Health Act Commission responding to points made about the special hospitals. I have placed copies of my letter and the other documents in the Library.

Medicines Commission

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to receive the annual report of the Medicines Commission for 1989.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have received the report and copies have today been laid before both Houses of Parliament in accordance with the requirements of section 5(2) of the Medicines Act 1968.

Bound volumes will shortly be placed in the libraries containing the 1989 reports of the Medicines Commission, the Committee on Safety of Medicines, the Veterinary Products Committee, the British Pharmacopoeia Commission, the Committee on the Review of Medicines and the Committee on Dental and Surgical Materials.

I am glad to pay tribute to the highly valuable work done by the distinguished members of the Medicines Act advisory bodies and thank them warmly for the time and effort which they contribute to the public interest in this most important field.

Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will now make a further statement about the future of the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research at Porton Down near Salisbury.

Mr. Dorrell: I have nothing to add to the reply my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave my hon. Friend on 19 April at column 990. A further statement will be made as soon as there is any substantial development to report.

Intensive Care Units

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many intensive care units there are; and what is the total number of beds in such units which have (a) a one-to-one nurse to patient relationship, (b) at least four beds per unit, (c) more than 250 admissions per annum and (d) full-time residential cover.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what basis he assesses the provision by district health authorities of intensive care treatment.

Mr. Dorrell: The provision of treatment in intensive care is a matter for clinicians. The facilities required are determined by health authorities in the light of local needs.

Radon Gas

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funding has been made available by his Department for research into the health risks of radon gas.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department sponsors the National Radiological Protection Board which is conducting a substantial research programme into the effects of radon. A total of £4·7 million was committed by the Department of Health to the NRPB in 1989-90. The Department together with the Department of Environment, the NRPB and the Imperial Cancer Research Fund, is funding a research project entitled "A Study into the Effects of Radon in Houses" at the cancer epidemiology unit, Oxford. Total Government funding for the study, until the end of the financial year 1989-90, was nearly £88,000 of which £31,355 was provided by the Department of Health.

Old Medicines

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to encourage the public to return old and unwanted medicines.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Old and unwanted medicines are collected regularly by pharmacies, even in the absence of locally organised DUMP—disposal of unwanted medicines and pills—campaigns.

The Department supports the role of the Royal Pharmaceutical Society and local environmental health and district health authorities in organising, publicising and disposing of returned medicines from DUMP campaigns, and in educating the public to dispose of medicines safely.

Electoral Registration

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the numbers of parliamentary constituencies in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland, showing in each case how many constituencies experienced (i) an increase and (ii) a decrease in electoral registration in the periods (i) 1987 to 1988, (ii) 1988 to 1989 and (iii) 1989 to 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table.

Number of parliamentary constituencies

	1987 to 1988 Electorates		1988 to 1989 Electorates		1989 to 1990[1] Electorates
	Increased	Decreased	Increased	Decreased	Increased	Decreased
England	283	240	253	270	286	237
Wales	23	15	27	11	34	4
Scotland[1]	18	54	15	57	38	33
Northern Ireland	11	6	12	5	14	3

[1]The parliamentary electorate remained unchanged in one Scottish constituency between 1989 and 1990.

NHS (Food Sales)

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to prevent food products purchased by national health service institutions at special trade terms from being resold at discounted prices.

Mr. Dorrell: No. Since the passing of the Health and Medicines Act (1988), national health organisations have been allowed to sell goods and services at a profit to the private sector. The Government have made it clear to health authorities in the White Paper and follow-up guidelines that they should seek opportunities for sensible income generation as one way of increasing funds available for patient care. The core business of the NHS Supplies Organisation nevertheless remains the provision of a service to the national health service.

Orthotic Service

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action his Department has taken following the recommendations of the national health service management consultancy services in its study of the orthotic service, which was published in October 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Comments received on the report are being considered. We are reviewing future arrangements for orthotic contracts with a view to introducing revised arrangements from 1 July 1991.

Hospital Discharges

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of (a) physically handicapped people, (b) mentally handicapped people and (c) mentally ill people who were discharged from hospital after a period of treatment lasting (i) one month, (ii) three months and (iii) six months, during each of the last five years.

Mr. Dorrell: The information available centrally is given in the table. The number of discharges is greater than the number of patients treated as some will be admitted more than once in a year.

Discharges by duration of stay 1983 to 1987-88[1]

Length of stay	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987-88
(a) Physically handicapped people. No information is available centrally.
(b) Mentally handicapped
Less than 1 month	27,549	31,548	34,380	36,155	30,870
One month or more but less than 3 months	1,208	1,213	1,188	1,178	1,100
Three months or more but less than 6 months	326	303	378	405	570
Six months or more but less than 1 year	256	285	309	566
(c) Mental illness
Less than 1 month	109,757	112,759	116,919	115,868	117,960
One month or more but less than 3 months	48,591	48,574	50,323	50,245	45,250

Six months or more but less than 1 year	4,697	5,043	4,921	5,149

[1]For 1987-88 the figures given are for finished district spells which are not strictly comparable with the discharges shown for earlier years.

Wheelchairs and Seating

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has received the report by the Leonard Cheshire Foundation on its wheelchair and seating project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The report has not been formally submitted to the Department. I understand a copy of the report has now been made available to the Disablement Services Authority and that a meeting has been arranged with the director of the Leonard Cheshire Foundation.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from the Disablement Services Authority concerning the level of funding required for the provision of special seating for disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Disablement Services Authority has brought the matter of funding for special seating for severely disabled people to our attention on several occasions and in particular at the formal reviews of the authority in 1988 and 1989. As a result, we have provided £1 million for this purpose from the present year onwards.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received concerning the level of funding required for the provision of special seating for disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: We have received a small number of recent letters from voluntary organisations. The Disablement Services Authority, which has the primary responsibility for the provision of special seating for severely disabled people in wheelchairs, has been allocated an additional £1 million specifically for this purpose from 1990-91 onwards. District health authorities continue to provide some special seating.

Prosthetic and Orthotic Courses

Mr. Orme: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the concern caused to patients, doctors, voluntary organisations and paramedical professional staff by the delay in funding the training of orthotists and prosthetists at Salford; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received concerning, and what action he proposes to take to meet, the shortfall of skilled prosthetists and orthotists arising from the delay in establishing the relevant courses at Salford; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Representations about funding for training have been received from the Orthotic and Prosthetic Training and Education Council, the London School of Prosthetics and the National Association of Limbless Disabled, and from some individuals. We have discussed the provision of a degree level course for orthotists and prosthetists at Salford with the Orthotic and Prosthetic Training Committee Universities Funding Council, Salford university and Salford polytechnic. Because of the complex issues involved, no decision is expected for some time.

Until the start of a new degree course, the Orthotic and Prosthetic Training and Education Council, which has responsibility for training of orthotists and prosthetists, are making plans to continue present training arrangements.

NHS Statistics

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many in-patient cases are now being treated in the national health service; what is the percentage difference between this figure and the figures in 1987, 1983 and 1979; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) how many day cases are now being treated in the national health service; and what is the percentage difference between this figure and the figures in 1987, 1983 and 1979.

Mr. Dorrell: A total of 6·59 million in-patient cases were treated in NHS hospitals in England during 1988-89, the latest date for which figures are available; this is 1 per cent. less than in 1987-88, 9 per cent. more than in 1983, and 22 per cent. more than in 1979.

A total of 1·02 million day cases were treated in NHS hospitals in England during 1988-89, the latest date for which figures are available; this is 15 per cent. more than in 1987-88, 25 per cent. more than in 1983, and 72 per cent. more than in 1979.

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what savings to the health servide have been made from the introduction of the selected list of drugs; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In 1985-86 the Selected List Scheme saved £75 million on the drugs bill. It is not possible to make meaningful estimates for subsequent years, but there is good reason to believe that significant savings continue to be made.

Whooping Cough

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current estimated vaccination rate against whooping cough currently; what is was in 1978, 1979 and 1987; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The percentage vaccination rates in England against whooping cough for the earlier years quoted were:

	Number
1978	31
1987-88	73

The latest year for which confirmed figures are available is 1988-89, when the uptake in England was 75 per cent. I am delighted to say, however, that the COVER—cover of vaccination evaluated rapidly—programme at the public health laboratory service board's communicable disease surveillance centre has recently reported results which demonstrate that at May this year vaccination coverage on whooping cough had reached 82 per cent. for England. Several district health authorities are believed to have reached coverage of 90 per cent. or more. These figures do not take account of the effect on uptake of the immunisation bonus payments for general practitioners, introduced in the new contract from April this year, or of the acceleration to two, three, and four months of the schedule for vaccinating infants against diphtheria, tetanus, whooping cough and poliomyelitis, which began on 1 May. We hope that both these developments will lead to even better coverage.

Needle Exchange Schemes

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many needle exchange schemes are currently operating in each regional health authority area in England.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 5 June at column 582.

NHS Industrial Therapy Units

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the numbers of patients working in industrial therapy units in national health service hospitals (a) in Britain and (b) by region.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Southern Derbyshire Health Authority

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) nurses and midwives, (b) hospital doctors, (c) general practitioners, (d) general practitioners' support staff and (e) dentists were employed by Southern Derbyshire health authority in 1984 and in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is as follows:

	1984	1988
Nurses and midwives[1]	3,870	3,980
General practitioners[2]	438	475
General practitioner support staff[3]	483	631
Dentists[3]	190	219
Hospital and community health service dentists[4]	13·1	10·9

[1] Whole time equivalents.
[2] Unrestricted principals in the Derbyshire family practitioner committee area.
[3] Figure covers dentists in general practice in the Derbyshire family practitioner area.
[4] Includes permanent paid, honorary and locum staff but excludes all consultants and senior registrars whose contracts are held by the regional health authority.

I shall write to my hon. Friend with the figures for hospital doctors, once the figures have been verified.

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) in-patients, (b) out-patients and (c) day-cases were treated by Southern Derbyshire health authority in 1984 and the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table.

Southern Derbyshire District Health Authority

	1984	1988-89	Percentage change
In-patients	53,558	54,759	+2
Out-patients	324,497	[1]317,672	−2
Day-cases	3,262	4,977	+52

GP Lists

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average general practitioner list size in Derbyshire health authority in 1984 and in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: At 1 October 1984, the average list size of general practitioners in Derbyshire family practitioner committee's area was 2,179. At 1 October 1988, the latest year for which figures are available, the figure was 2,043.

Hampshire GPs (Late Payment)

Mr. John Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the late payment by Hampshire family practitioner committee to general practitioners in Hampshire; and what steps have been taken to remedy the shortfall in cash flow to doctors.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All general practitioners in Hampshire were paid an advance by the due date of 29 June. Further advances were made to GPs on 6 July and 13 July which were designed to remedy any shortfall against the amount due. If, in any particular case, a doctor continues to experience a cash flow problem he or she should discuss the matter with the family practitioner committee. The committee will make any necessary adjustments as soon as possible.

Heart Disease

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the rate of ECG testing for heart disease per 1,000 of population in each of the district health authorities in the north-west region.

Mr. Dorrell: The available information is given in the table. Patients may be referred for an electrocardiogram to a district other than the one in which they reside. The rates per thousand population may therefore have little significance.

Requests for electrocardiograms[1] (ECGs) and rates per thousand population, North Western region, 1988-89

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of staff employed in ECG testing for heart disease in each district health authority in the north-west region.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally.

Prescribing

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library a copy of all the professional publications his Department has provided to national health service doctors containing advice about drug prescribing, including those referred to in his reply of 16 July Official Report, column 411, together with any departmental cover letters sent with such documents.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The professional publications containing advice about drug prescribing which are provided to NHS doctors at the Department's expense are as follows:

British National Formulary
Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin (including adverse Drug Reactions Bulletin)
Prescriber's Journal
Current Problems

Copies of each edition of these publications are already sent routinely to the Library.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health further to his answer of 16 July Official Report, column 411, if he will list the specific circulars, documents and advice notes issued by his Department over the past 10 years in respect of (a) over-prescribing and (b) under-prescribing; and if he will place copies of all such documents in the Library.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department issued comprehensive guidance to family practitioner committees' on the management of the general medical services under the White Paper "Promoting Better Health", including prescribing, in November 1989. FPCs are now concentrating their efforts on preparing for the introduction of the indicative prescribing scheme in April 1991. To assist them we issued on 23 May 1990 "Improving Prescribing" a working paper on the operation of the scheme. Copies of "Promoting Better Health" and "Improving Prescribing" were placed in the Library at the time of their issue. We intend to issue further guidance on financial and other matters relating to the scheme in the autumn.

Asthma

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have (a) suffered from and (b) died from asthma in each of the last five years for which figures are available; how many family practitioner committees curently fund asthma clinics run by their general practitioners; and whether the Government intends to continue their support for asthma screening clinics in general practice.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information on the number of people suffering from asthma is not available. The information requested on deaths from asthma is set out in the table. Information on the number of family practitioner committees making sessional payments to GPs running health promotion clinics for asthma sufferers is not collected centrally. It is for family practitioner committees to determine which clinics will qualify for sessional payments as health promotion clinics. In principle, and provided the FPC is satisfied that the other criteria—duration, numbers attending, and so on—are met, there is no reason why asthma clinics should not qualify for payments.

Number of deaths due to asthma[1], England and Wales 1985-89

Year	Males	Females	Total
1985	828	1,144	1,972
1986	827	1,163	1,990
1987	803	1,095	1,898
1988	832	1,174	2,006
[2]1989	782	1,175	1,957

Note:
From 1986 onwards an underlying cause of death was not assigned to deaths occurring to those aged 28 days. 1986[2] data therefore relate to those deaths occurring at 28 days[2].

Food Poisoning

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of campylobacter food poisoning have been reported to his Department over the last 12 months; and whether any health warnings about the bacteria have been published.

Mr. Dorrell: Laboratory reports to the public health laboratory service communicable disease surveillance centre of campylobacter for England and Wales are:—
1989 = 32,745[1]
1990 to week 26 (that is, week ending 29 June) = 15,768[1].

[1] Provisional.

In May 1989, 14 million copies of the food safety leaflet —a copy is available in the Library—jointly published by the Department of Health and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food were distributed to the general public. This leaflet gave advice on how food could be handled safely to avoid the human health risks posed by some types of bacteria, including campylobacter.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Single Parents

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will commission a study on the disincentive effects of specific welfare benefits in relation to the encouragement of single mothers to return to work.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Social security benefits are structured so that, while not requiring lone parents with children up to the age of 16 to be available for work, they contain measures which help lone parents who wish to work. In income support lone parents have the first £15 of their earnings disregarded; this is higher than for most single people and couples. In family credit loan parents get the same adult credit as two-parent families and one-parent benefit is disregarded in calculating their income. In addition, in October the earnings disregard in housing benefit and community charge benefit for lone parents not on income support will be raised from £15 to £25 a week. We keep these arrangements under continuing review to ensure they work in the way intended, and commission independent research where appropriate.

Local Offices

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will provide details of the agreed timetables for the introduction of new local office reorganisation, region by region;

(2) if he will make it his policy that the full range of social security benefits and levels of services provided by local offices of his Department, in particular that located at Hill House, Mansfield, will continue after the implementation of his Department's organisation review.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I am happy to confirm that it is our policy that local offices should continue to provide the full range of social security benefits and current or improved levels of service following implementation of our network review. Once local managers have been appointed later this year they will start detailed planning, the principal aim of which will be to ensure that the best possible service to local customers is provided.

The timetable for implementation of the new network will depend on many local and national factors including the availability of resources. Final decisions have yet to be taken.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Rochdale (Sir C. Smith) on 11 July at columns 242-43 for more details of the network review.

Social Fund

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications for review were received during the period April 1989 to March 1990 inclusive in respect of (a) social fund community care grants, (b) social fund budgeting loans and (c) social fund crisis loans, by each of his Department's local offices at Eston, Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Redcar and Stockton, and how many of each of these applications for review resulted in revised decisions.

Mr. Scott: The following tables show the number of applications for review that were made at the Eston, Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Redcar and Stockton local offices in the period April 1989 to March 1990 and the number of revised decisions in that period.

	Applications received	Decisions revised
Eston
Community care grants	180	23
Budgeting loans	493	53
Crisis loans	9	2
Hartlepool
Community care grants	265	36
Budgeting loans	444	55

	Applications received	Decisions revised
Crisis loans	9	3

Budgeting loans	1,076	169
Crisis loans	30	6
Redcar
Community care grants	239	47
Budgeting loans	282	48
Crisis loans	8	2

Some of the revised decisions will refer to review applications made in a previous period and decisions may not have been made on some of the review applications made in the period shown.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications for review of social fund decisions were received by the office of the social fund inspectors during the period April 1989 to March 1990 inclusive in respect of (a) social fund community care grants, (b) social fund budgeting loans and (c) social fund crisis loans, relating to decisions made by each of his Department's offices at Eston, Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Redcar and Stockton; and how many of these applications for social fund inspectors review resulted in (i) decisions substituted by the social fund inspectors, (ii) decisions referred back to the social fund office and (iii) decisions confirmed by the social fund inspectors.

Mr. Scott: I am advised by the Social Fund Commissioner that, between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990, a total of 430 applications for review were received at the office of the social fund inspectors from the Department's offices at Eston, Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Redcar and Stockton. The social fund inspectors have reached decisions in 358 cases from these offices in this period.

The information, as requested, is shown in the following table

Numbers of applications for review received at the office of the social fund inspector April 1989 to March 1990

Pensions

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what information he has as to which countries in the EEC pay a pension equivalent to the invalid care allowance; and what are the rates paid to people who receive this pension (a) before 60 years of age and (b) after 60 years of age in each country.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The United Kingdom is the only country in the European Community which pays a benefit to a carer, in the form of invalid care allowance—as distinct from any other benefit paid to an invalid person.

Young People (Benefits)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families with children in full-time education (a) 16 years, (b) 17 years and (c) 18 years were in receipt of (i) income support, and (ii) family credit, in 1989-90; and how many families lost the child allowance in the benefit during the course of that year because the child, even though in full-time education, reached the age of 19 years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is set out in the table. Families appear in each age category in which they have a child.

Families with children	On income support[1]	On family credit[2]
Aged 16 years	66,000	20,000
Aged 17 years	26,000	9,500
Aged 18 years	15,000	5,000

[1] Source: annual statistical inquiry May 1989.

[2] Figures relate to awards current at 31 March 1990 and refer to the age of the child at the beginning of the 26-week award.

I regret that information on the number of families on income support where the child's personal allowance was lost during 1989-90 is not available. Family credit awards have regard to the age of the child at the start of the award and the amount payable remains unchanged throughout the period of the 26-week award, even if the 19th birthday falls in that period. No information is available about the number of 19-year-olds still in full-time, non-advanced education at the expiry of the last family credit award in which they were included as a dependant.

Women Pensioners

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average contribution record, including credits for home responsibility of women retiring in each of the last 10 years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of women retiring in each of the last 10 years received a full category A pension.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is set out in the table.

Percentage of awards of retirement pension to women at the full category A rate

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will bring forward proposals to amend section 37A(5)(a) of the Social Security Act 1975, to ensure disabled under-fives have an entitlement to mobility allowance.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans to do so.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimated (a) gross cost and (b) net cost to the Exchequer of increasing the present severe disablement allowance to the full rate of invalidity benefit; and how many people will be affected by this.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) on 12 June at column 164. The current number of recipients of severe disablement allowance is 274,500.

Disabled People

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have (a) 40 per cent. or more disability and (b) 80 per cent. or more disability; and how many in each category are aged (i) 60 to 65 years, (ii) 65 to 70 years (iii) 70 to 75 years and (iv) over 75 years.

Mr. Scott: Information is not available in the form requested. Available details for people receiving industrial injuries disablement benefit and war disablement pension are in the table.

(a) Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit

	35 per cent. disablement and over	75 per cent. disablement and over
Total (all ages)	49,950	6,780
Age 60-64	7,710	820
65-69	7,700	1,140
70-74	5,400	670
75 and over	6,460	860

(b) War Disablement Pension

	40 per cent. disablement and over	80 per cent. disablement and over
Total (all ages)	[1]71,460	19,527

[1] Of these about 48,000 are aged 65 or over.

Disability Employment Credit

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department intends to issue a consultative document based on the proposals for a disability employment credit published in the White Paper entitled "The Way Ahead".

Mr. Scott: When we announced our proposals in "The Way Ahead: Benefits for Disabled People" (Cm 917) on 10 January we made it clear that we would continue to welcome views and comments whilst work was progressing on the two new benefits, disability allowance and disability employment credit.

Operational Strategy

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the latest estimate of the cost of the operational strategy, indicating how and why this differs from the original estimate.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest available estimate is in the order of £1,800 million up to the end of March 1999. The reasons for the difference between this figure and the estimate made in 1982 were examined by the Committee of Public Accounts in its 24th report—HC 179. I refer the hon. Member to that report.

Unemployment Costs

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest estimate of the saving to the Exchequer of each 100,000 reduction in the number of people unemployed.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest estimate is contained in table 14.22 of Cm 1014. The figure for 1990-91 is £265 million.

Pensioners

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners there are over the age of 75 years, divided into males and females; and what is (a) their average income from all sources and (b) the income distribution of such pensioners.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It is estimated in March 1989 that there are 1·33 million male pensioners and 2·58 million female pensioners over the age of 75.

(Source: Retirement Pension statistics March 1989).

The average net income of pensioners[1] over 75 from all sources was £87·70 per week in 1987. The income distribution was as follows[2]:

	Per cent.
Up to £50 per week	18
£50·01 to £75 per week	42
£75·01 to £100 per week	19
Over £100 per week	21

[1] All figures refer to single pensioners aged over 75 and couples where the head is over 75. Figures for males and females cannot be provided separately due to inadequate statistical sample size.

Epilepsy

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people suffering from epilepsy have been refused attendance allowance benefit.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not available.

Young People

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement concerning the Government's intention to commission independent research into the operation of benefit and youth training provision for 16 and 17-year-olds; and if the research will include an examination of the appropriateness or suitability of the training for the young people's needs and the size of the sample.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Further details of the proposed research into the operation of arrangements for 16 and 17-year-olds, announced by my noble Friend in another place on 2 July, will be given shortly.

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what differences apply between the rights of European Community students and European Community non-students in claiming social security benefits.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Students and non-students who are nationals of other EC member states and have a right of residence in the United Kingdom have the same social security benefit rights as their counterparts who are United Kingdom nationals. In addition EC nationals who are workers, whether or not they are also students, are covered by the provisions of Social Security Regulations (EEC) No. 1408/71—co-ordination of member states' social security schemes for migrant workers and their families.

Community Care

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give full details of the expenditure implications for his Department of delaying full implementation of the community care proposals.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The public expenditure White Paper—Cm. 1014—contains the present planning totals for social security expenditure. These totals do not take account of the community care benefit changes now planned for 1993. Adjustments to these totals for any reason will be made in this year's public expenditure survey in the usual way.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures he proposes to implement in order to increase the take-up of attendance allowance among members of the social security disabled persons register.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply of 11 July 1990, c. 243]: The reply should have read:

"We have no plans to mount such a campaign. The number of people receiving attendance allowance has more than doubled from 286,000 in 1979 to 763,000 in 1989".

Bradford and Keighley Local Offices

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide for the Bradford and Keighley social security offices comparable information to that provided in his answer of 6 July to the hon. Member for Islington, North, (Mr. Corbyn) Official Report, column 721, together with the same information for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 17 July 1990]: The tables show the comparative single payments and social fund expenditures for the Bradford East, Bradford South, Bradford West and Keighley Department of Social Security offices as reckoned by the gross domestic product deflator.

Household Incomes

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will now publish the 1987 data on households below average income.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [pursuant to her reply, 20 July, 1990]: We are today publishing the new edition of "Households Below Average Income", copies of which I am placing in the Library. I am also placing in the Library copies of my right hon Friend the Secretary of State's response to the Social Services Select Committee's fourth report, on low-income statistics.

EMPLOYMENT

Nottingham TEC

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he next plans to visit Nottingham training and enterprise council.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend visited Nottingham on 15 June and was delighted to be able to confirm the award of development funding to the Greater Nottingham training and enterprise council (TEC). He has no immediate plans to make a further visit to the TEC.

Training Agencies

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assistance his Department has given to the fraud squad in its investigation into the Mutual Aid Centre Managing Agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Every assistance requested was given by my Department to the fraud squad, to help them with their investigations relating to the Mutual Aid Centre Managing Agency.

As always, it is the policy of my Department where there are cases of alleged misuse of public funds or fraud, to carry out investigations and to provide every assistance to the appropriate authorities.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide the total funding given to each of (a) Mutual Aid Centre Managing Agency, North London Managing Agency, South London Managing Agency, East London Managing Agency, Birmingham Managing Agency and Chilterns Managing Agency, (b) Inner City Training Ltd., (c) City Training Link, (d) Electronics Aids Workshop and (e) High Wycombe (Brass Tacks) Workshop Ltd.

Mr. Eggar: I regret that the information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if the Training Agency receives annual accounts and lists of company shareholders for all training agents and managers involved in the delivery of employment training/community project and youth training.

Mr. Nicholls: My Department receives annual accounts from training providers contracted with the Training Agency for the delivery of employment training/youth training. Under the former community programme, managing agents provided audited accounts on an annual basis. Lists of company shareholders are not received.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on (a) the monitoring of expenditure in employment training by the Training Agency, (b) the role of the Training Advisory Standard Service in ensuring the quality of employment training and (c) the progress made by the Training Agency in training agents and training managers achieving approved training organisation status.

Mr. Nicholls: My Department monitors closely the level of expenditure on employment training through its financial management and accounting system. The Training Standards Advisory Service provides an objective assessment of the quality of training offered by approved training organisations. At 31 May 1990, 153 training agents and 881 training managers had received approval for stage 1 and one training agent and six training managers had received approval for stage 2. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) on 20 July 1990.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of visits made by the Training Agency to each of (a) Mutual Aid Centre Managing Agency, (b) Inner City Training Ltd, (c) City Training Link, (d) Electronics Aids Workshop, and (e) High Wycombe (Brass Tacks) Workshops Ltd.

Mr. Eggar: Training Agency staff have made a large number of formal and informal visits to Inner City Training Limited and City Training Link. Precise numbers are not available. The other organisations listed by the hon. Member ceased to deliver training programmes before or shortly after September 1988, when the Training Agency came into existence.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about Inner City Training Ltd's termination of its horticultural scheme.

Mr. Eggar: Information on this matter is relevant to a contract with an individual training provider and is therefore commercial in confidence.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total expenditure on (a) employment training agents and (b) employment training training management in the period September 1988 to April 1990.

Mr. Nicholls: For the period September 1988 to end March 1990, total expenditure on employment training (ET) training agents was £37·9 million and ET training managers was £667·9 million. Expenditure information for April 1990 is not available in the form requested.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will review the use of training agents and training managers in the delivery of employment training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to review the current use of training agents and training managers in employment training. My Department keeps their performance under constant review. Training and enterprise councils and local enterprise companies will make arrangements to deliver employment training in the manner most appropriate to the needs of their areas. These arrangements are described in the corporate and business plans approved by the appropriate Secretary of State.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if the £65,000 owed to the Training Agency by Mutual Aid Centre Managing Agency, as a result of the company going into receivership, has been repaid.

Mr. Eggar: I am informed that the £65,000 mentioned in the Mutual Aid Centre Managing Agency's schedule of creditors has not been repaid.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when the fraud squad completed its investigation of the Mutual Aid Centre Managing Agency's involvement in the community programme and youth training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My Department has no information on the date when the fraud squad completed its investigation.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when involvement of City Training Link in employment training and community programme and youth training was approved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: City Training Link was approved to deliver employment training on 22 September 1988. The organisation has not been involved in the community programme or youth training.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those managing agencies whose involvement in Government training schemes has been discussed with the National Audit Office.

Mr. Eggar: The National Audit Office visits a large number of managing agents each year as part of their normal audit of my Department's accounts. Further visits may occur in connection with value-for-money studies. My Department is in frequent contact with National Audit Office about its findings, as a matter of routine. It is not possible to provide a list containing the name of every managing agent whose involvement in training schemes has at some time been discussed.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when involvement of Inner City Training Ltd. in employment training, community programme or youth training was approved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Inner City Training Ltd. was approved to deliver employment training on 2 September 1988. This organisation has never participated in the community programme or youth training.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment in how many and in which areas of the European Community more jobs have been lost, both in proportion and in total, than in the metropolitan borough of Rotherham during the last 10 years.

Mr. Nicholls: Comparable information is not available.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment in how many areas of the European Community the level of unemployment is higher than in the metropolitan borough of Rotherham.

Mr. Nicholls: Comparable information is not available.

Employment Service Offices (Closures)

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, pursuant to the reply from Mr. M. Fogden of 29 June, the jobcentres and employment offices due to close by parliamentary constituency; and if he has received representations about the closures from any right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Eggar: The agency framework document for the employment service (ES) sets out the relationship between the Secretary of State for Employment and the chief executive of the agency.

I am informed by the chief executive of the employment service that the information requested about ES local offices is set out in the table. The offices are all small part-time or limited offices which only provide a restricted range of services. A number of representations have been received from right hon. and hon. Members.

Disabled People

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will withdraw his consultative document on "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities" pending the completion of consultations on the future of the services currently provided by the employee rehabilitation centre, Western avenue, Cardiff.

Mr. Eggar: No. The consultative document identifies a wide range of action that the Government intends to take and proposals on which we have asked for comments. All of the issues are of considerable importance to the future provision of employment and training for people with disabilities and the consultation process on the document is well under way. As I mentioned in my reply to the hon. Member on 18 July, consultations about the future provision and location of services specifically provided by the employment rehabilitation centre in Cardiff have not yet commenced.

Laurence Rosen

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if, in the light of the findings resulting from police inquiries made into the activities of Mr. Laurence Rosen of Office Angels Ltd., he will consider whether Mr. Rosen falls within the provisions of section 2(2)(b) or (c) or (e) of the Employment Agencies Act 1973; and whether he proposes to take any action;

(2) whether any inquiries are being or have been made, under the provisions of section 9(1) of the Employment Agencies Act 1973, into the employment business carried out by Mr. Laurence Rosen of Office Angels Ltd.; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will consider whether, in the light of police inquiries into the conduct of Mr. Laurence Rosen of Office Angels Ltd., there are sufficient grounds for the licence granted to Mr. Rosen or his company, under the Employment Agencies Act 1973, to be revoked under the provisions of section 3 of that Act.

Mr. Eggar: Since Office Angels Limited began business in 1986, each of its branches has been inspected by an employment agency licensing inspector. No evidence to justify revocation of a licence was discovered.

The hon. Member will know that specific information about Mr. Rosen has just been passed to the Department. My noble Friend Lord Strathclyde will write to the hon. Member as soon as the information has been fully considered.

Sheltered Employment

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of the registered disabled people in Great Britain are classified under section 2 of the disabled persons employment register, as eligible for sheltered employment.

Mr. Eggar: The employment service, became an executive agency on 2 April 1990. Mr. Mike Fogden, the Employment Service Agency's chief executive, will be replying in writing to the hon. Gentleman.

Youth Training

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many guarantee liaison officers for youth training have been appointed in the United Kingdom, and how many in Scotland.

Mr. Nicholls: Appointments of guarantee liaison officers are now being made in every training agency area office in Great Britain. Training and enterprise councils are obliged by contract to provide an equivalent service within their areas. The number who have been appointed is not available centrally.

Action for Jobs

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what expenditure was incurred on the action for jobs campaign in 1986-87 in addition to printed material, television advertising, press advertising, radio advertising, outdoor advertising, exhibition materials and presentations.

Mr. Eggar: Expenditure of £150,000 on regional events and £50,000 on research was incurred on the action for jobs campaign in 1986-87 in addition to expenditure on printed material, television advertising, Press advertising, radio advertising, outdoor advertising, exhibition materials and presentations.

Noise Regulations

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the companies which have been granted exemptions from the Noise at Work Regulations 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: No exemptions have been granted.

Training Expenditure

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, in cash and constant prices, expenditure on (a) the youth training scheme or youth training and (b) the community industry training scheme for (i) outturn 1987-88 and 1988-89, (ii) estimated outturn 1989-90 and (iii) planned 1990-91 to 1992-93.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 9 July 1990]: Expenditure on YTS and community industry in 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 and planned expenditure on youth training from 1990-91 to 1992-93 is as follows:

	YTS (YT)		Community Industry
	Cash prices £ million	Constant prices[1] £ million	Cash prices £ million	Constant prices[1] £ million
1987-88 outturn	987·8	1,201·9	20·2	24·6

1992-93 planned[2]	763·0	661·0	—	—

[1] Constant (estimated) 1990-91 prices calculated using the GDP deflator index updated in the Chancellor's Financial Statement and Budget Report of March 1990.

[2] Separate figures for YT and CI are not available. Expenditure on community industry is subsumed within those given for youth training.

Note: These figures do not include £12·0 million and £25·0 million (in 1989-90 prices) set aside for the delivery of YT credit pilots during the financial year 1991-92 and 1992-93 respectively.

Tourism

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to encourage school-leavers into careers in both the public and private sectors of tourist and leisure services.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 17 July 1990]: The tourism industry already persuades many people to make careers in it. In the year to December 1989 the number of employees in sectors directly related to tourism increased by 50,000. My right hon. and learned Friend is encouraged by many new initiatives that the industry, with the involvement of the tourist boards, has taken to attract young recruits. Total Government support to the national tourist boards has increased in the current financial year to further support this important industry.

Health and Safety

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has had with representatives from Trans Manche Link over publication of the full Health and Safety Executive accident prevention advisory unit report including conclusions and recommendations on health and safety issues arising from construction of the channel tunnel.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 20 July 1990]: My right hon. and learned Friend has not had any such discussions with TML.

The reports of such studies are confidential between the Health and Safety Executive and the employer, and it is for them to agree the extent of any publication.

Employment Training Inspectors

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is (a) the total number of inspectors dealing with adult training, (b) the total number of inspectors dealing with youth training and (c) the total overall number of inspectors employed by the Training Advisory Standards Service.

Mr. Eggar: The Training Standards Advisory Service has a staff of 45 inspectors, all of whom deal with both youth and adult training.

Employment Training

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if there is any limit placed on the remuneration paid to directors of companies involved in the delivery of employment training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no limit placed on the remuneration paid to directors of companies involved in the delivery of employment training. Such matters are for the decision of the providers concerned.

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish the employment training leavers survey that he referred to in his speech to the National Council of Voluntary Organisations.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 16 July 1990]: I am reviewing the use and publication of the employment training follow-up survey to take into account the needs of TECs. A decision on publication will be made in due course.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Soviet Union (Exit Visas)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will make representations to the Soviet Union about their failure to grant an exit visa to Boris Nepomniaschi and his family, of Moscow.

Mr. Waldegrave: We can certainly raise the case of Boris Nepomniaschi and his family with the Soviet authorities, but in order to make our representations as effective as possible we shall need further details.

Khmer Rouge

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom will now withdraw Her Majesty's Government's support for recognition of the Khmer Rouge at the United Nations in the light of Secretary of State James Baker's recent statement on the United States Government's decision to open dialogue with the Vietnamese Government and withdraw recognition from the Khmer Rouge coalition.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration has been given to holding a review of the situation regarding Cambodia's United Nations seat before the autumn.

Mr. Sainsbury: As we have made clear before, we and our European Community partners have for some while been considering what changes are necessary in the arrangements for Cambodia's representation at the United Nations. We do not want the coalition of which the Khmer Rouge is a member to continue to occupy the Cambodian seat.

Vietnam

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) whether he will review Britain's policy on the admission of Vietnam to the International Monetary Fund; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he last discussed with the American Government Her Majesty's Government's policy on the admission of Vietnam to the International Monetary Fund.

Mr. Sainsbury: Vietnam was admitted to the International Monetary Fund on 21 September 1956 and has been a member ever since.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Economic Community last discussed the accreditation of a Vietnamese ambassador; and what was the position of (a) Her Majesty's Government, (b) France, (c) Germany and (d) Italy.

Mr. Maude: Relations between the Community and Vietnam are regularly discussed within the political co-operation framework. Our position remains as set out in the reply given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to the hon. Member for St. Helen's, North (Mr. Evans) on 4 July. Our EC partners respect our view that it is not yet appropriate to establish diplomatic links with Vietnam. However, we and our partners are keeping this under continuing review.

Rindall River National Park

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the plans of the British company Rio Tinto Zinc to mine uranium in the Rindall River national park, Australia; whether he intends to make any representations to the company or the Australian Government about the likely effect on aboriginals in that area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Our information is that an Australian subsidiary of an Australian company in which Rio Tinto Zinc has an interest has been considering mining uranium in the Rudall River national park. The regulations of mining is a matter for the Australian Government.

South of France

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what official visits have taken place to Monaco and the south of France in 1990.

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Industry visited Cannes in May. The vice-chief of the Defence Staff visited Draguignan and Les Issambres also in May. There have also been several visits to Toulon, Marseilles and other ports by Her Majesty's ships.

Diplomatic List

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason the London diplomatic list has not been published by his Department since December 1989; and when the next six-monthly edition will be available.

Mr. Sainsbury: The need for the late amendment of two entries in the list has regrettably resulted in a delay in distributing the edition due at the end of June 1990. It is now due to be distributed before the end of July.

Cambodia

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's response to the statement by United States Secretary of State Baker regarding Cambodia on 18 July.

Mr. Sainsbury: We welcome the United States decision to hold talks with Vietnam on Cambodia. We share the United States Government's determination to prevent the Khmer Rouge from taking power. Our common objective is to create conditions for the Cambodian people to elect a government, free from the fear of civil war and Khmer Rouge atrocities.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what composition of a Cambodian Supreme National Council was agreed by the United Nations Permanent Five in Paris on 16-17 July.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Five called on the Cambodian parties to agree to the establishment at an early date, as an integral part of a comprehensive political settlement, of a Supreme National Council composed of representative individuals with authority among the Cambodian people.

A copy of the summary of conclusions of the meeting on 16-17 July has been placed in the Library.

British Embassy, Washington

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff in the embassy in Washington deal with civil aviation matters; what are their grades; and what are their individual job specifications.

Mr. Sainsbury: The transport policy section of the embassy comprises three diplomatic staff, some of whose time is dedicated to civil aviation matters as follows:

Counsellor (assistant secretary): Approx 30 per cent.
First Secretary (principal): Approx 25 per cent.
Second secretary (senior executive officer): Approx 40 per cent.
These are in addition two United Kingdom-based secretaries (S2s) in the section.

The Minister (commercial) also spends approximately 10 per cent. of his time on civil aviation matters; the ambassador is brought in as and when necessary.

The civil aviation objectives of the section, towards which all three front-line staff work, are broadly to help formulate United Kingdom policies in the light of industry and policy developments in the United States; to influence United States policies; to resist protectionist, unilateral, or extraterritorial measures by the United States; to manage and resolve United Kingdom-United States disputes to British advantage.

Fauna Conservation Officers

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current number of FO GII grade officers in the fauna conservation section of the Agriculture and Fisheries Department in Hong Kong; and what plans exist to increase the establishment level.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 9 July 1990]: There are currently seven officers of this grade in the fauna conservation section of the Agriculture and Fisheries Department. The establishment level will be reviewed in accordance with normal procedures.

Hong Kong (Customs and Excise)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current in place staffing level of the special task force set up by the Hong Kong customs and excise service; and if there are any plans to increase staffing levels.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 9 July 1990]: The special task force set up by the Hong Kong customs and excise department has a staff of 12, responsible for gathering intelligence, scrutinising manifests, and conducting follow-up investigations on ivory seizures. There are no plans at present to increase its size; the allocation of additional resources will be considered if required.

Ivory

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Hong Kong Department of Agriculture and Fisheries is providing all the information on elephant ivory requested by the World Wide Fund for Nature, Hong Kong.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 9 July 1990]: The Hong Kong Agriculture and Fisheries Department has provided all the information on elephant ivory requested by the World Wide Fund for Nature, Hong Kong, which is immediately available. The only information requested by WWF (HK) which has not yet been provided relates to the countries of origin of tusks held in Hong Kong. This information is being compiled and will be forwarded to WWF (HK) as soon as it is available.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current total of all ivory known to be held in Hong Kong; and on what date it was assessed.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 9 July 1990]: The current total of all commercial ivory stocks known to be in Hong Kong as at 7 July 1990 was 468 tonnes (to the nearest tonne).

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply of 7 June, Official Report, column 688, how many spot checks have been made by the Hong Kong authorities to ensure that the regulations regarding the possession and transfer of elephant ivory are complied with.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 9 July 1990]: Twenty-seven spot checks to ivory-holding premises were carried out by Hong Kong authorities in June 1990.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps have been taken by the Hong Kong authorities to check whether the 960 kg of ivory name seals recently seized by Japanese customs officers and originating from Hong Kong has disappeared from the registered ivory stock; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 9 July 1990]: The Hong Kong Customs and Excise Department is investigating this case. Its preliminary findings were that the consignments (manifested as ceramic lions) had been shipped from Hong Kong. But there is no way of identifying whether the seizures in Japan were part of the ivory stock registered in Hong Kong since they were all in the form of name seals. The Agriculture and Fisheries Department is, nevertheless, conducting inspections on selected stock holders. Six persons have been arrested and the Attorney-General's advice on possible prosecution is being sought.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply of 7 June, Official Report, column 688, if he will give more details of the illegal export of ivory from the United Kingdom seized by the Hong Kong customs and excise special task force.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 9 July 1990]: The ivory consignment in question was originally exported from Hong Kong to Spain on 4 July 1989 and subsequently returned to Hong Kong via London on 10 November 1989. On arrival, it was seized by the Hong Kong customs and excise department. The exporter in Hong Kong was prosecuted and fined HK $1,000. The seizure of 55 kgs ivory products was confiscated.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of measures to be adopted by the Hong Kong authorities to prevent further exports of ivory when the reservation ends on 17 July.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 9 July 1990]: The Hong Kong customs and excise department will continue to conduct random export checks. The department has also alerted customs administrations in the ESCAP region to the possibility of illicit shipments of ivory from Hong Kong, when the reservation ends on 17 July 1990. The Agriculture and Fisheries Department will continue to conduct suprise checks on ivory stock holders. No export licence will be issued for commercial exports of ivory from 17 July 1990, and any person found to have exported ivory without a licence will be liable to prosecution and a fine, as well as confiscation of the ivory in question.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current number of licensed ivory traders in Hong Kong; and what was the number 12 months ago.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding reply 9 July 1990]: The number of possession licences issued to holders of commercial ivory stocks in Hong Kong was 879 as at 7 July 1990. No figures are available for the same period last year since traders have only been required to have possession licences since 12 January 1990.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs at what time and date the reservation entered by Her Majesty's Government on behalf of Hong Kong permitting the continuation of trade in ivory by the Crown colony will end; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding reply 9 July 1990]: The six-month reservation entered by us on behalf of Hong Kong was withdrawn with effect from midnight on 17 July 1990.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what circumstances ivory will be allowed to leave Hong Kong following the expiry of the reservation at midnight on 17 July; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 10 July 1990]: Following the expiry of the reservation, the export of ivory from Hong Kong will be subject to the conditions specified by article III and article VII of CITES.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current tradeable ivory stock held in Hong Kong; and to which countries ivory has been exported since he last answered a similar question.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 10 July 1990]: As at 7 July, a total of 468 tonnes (to the nearest tonne) of ivory was available for trade locally, of which 352 tonnes had CITES documentation and could be exported commercially until the reservation period expired on 18 July 1990.

Between 1 June 1990 to 7 July 1990 the Hong Kong CITES authority has been notified of the following ivory exports:

Destination	Quantity kilograms
China	111
Andorra	41·4
Taiwan	14

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to take to prevent Hong Kong allowing the export of worked ivory without a licence as personal effects in violation of CITES rules; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 10 July 1990]: Hong Kong's legislation complies fully with the CITES Regulations. Under article VII.3 of CITES, the export of personal or household effects (without restriction on quantity) is permitted, without a licence, except where these effects are acquired by the owner outside his state of usual residence, and are being imported into that state.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has regarding the quantity of ivory classified as personal effects which may be exported after 18 July from Hong Kong providing import permission has been obtained from the importing country.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 16 July 1990]: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of the type of ivory personal effects which the Hong Kong authorities will allow to be exported after the current reservation ends at midnight on 17 July.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 16 July 1990]: After the reservation expires, the Hong Kong authorities will allow only the export of ivory personal effects in accordance with article III and article VII of CITES.

ENERGY

Electricity Privatisation

12. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of South Wales Electricity to discuss privatisation.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend and I meet regional electricity company chairmen regularly to discuss a range of matters.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the cost of the launch of the electricity companies' annual reports on 19 July.

Mr. Wakeham: The cost of the launch of the annual reports on 19 July is a matter for the 12 regional electricity companies.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the latest estimated advertising budget for the sale of the electricity distribution companies.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave to him on 1 May and 6 June 1990.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are the dates and venues for each of the roadshows for the privatisation of the electricity distribution companies.

Mr. Wakeham: Arrangements for the road shows to promote the offers for sale of the 12 regional electricity companies are being developed. Final dates and venues are not yet available.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

13. Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the world's carbon dioxide emissions is emitted in the United Kingdom.

62. Mr. Couchman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the world's carbon dioxide emissions are emitted by the United Kingdom.

65. Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the world's carbon dioxide emissions are emitted by the United Kingdom.

Mr. Wakeham: The United Kingdom contributes about 3 per cent. to global emissions of carbon dioxide.

Scottish Coalfields

14. Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current rate of production from the Scottish coalfields.

Mr. Baldry: In 1989-90 the Scottish coalfields produced 1·9 million tonnes from deep mines, and 3·5 million tonnes from opencast.

Coal Imports

15. Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Coal on the subject of future levels of coal imports.

16. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most up-to-date estimate of the level of coal imports in 1990, 1995 and 2000.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Coal on a regular basis to discuss all aspects of the coal industry, including imports. My Department does not prepare estimates of coal imports.

51. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Coal regarding coal imports; and if he will make a statement.

69. Mrs. Heal: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Coal to discuss the future level of coal imports.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Coal on a regular basis to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

34. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most up-to-date estimate of the level of coal imports in 1990, 1995 and 2000.

Mr. Baldry: We do not make such estimates.

Central Area Transmission System

17. Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress of applications relating to the proposed central area transmission system.

23. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress for applications relating to the proposed central area transmission system.

25. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress of applications relating to the proposed central area transmission system.

72. Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress of applications relating to the proposed central area transmission system.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Amoco, the operator for the Everest and Lomond gas fields in the central North sea, has now submitted draft proposals for the development of the fields and for the installation of a pipeline to evacuate the gas from them to Teesside. These draft proposals are currently being examined by my officials.

Offshore Platforms

18. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the number and value of contracts placed in 1989 and so far in the current year, with United Kingdom offshore fabricators, for the construction of structures for the offshore oil and gas industries.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The value of awards to United Kingdom fabricators reported by operators in 1989 was £511 million. Awards in 1990 already total £594 million.

Oil and Gas Production

19. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of oil and gas production in the United Kingdom continental shelf between 1990 and 1994.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Forecasts for oil production during this period are set out in the report to Parliament of April 1990 "Development of the Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom". Gas production will depend on many factors, but I expect it to grow strongly over this period.

60. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what progress is being made in reducing the number of fallow blocks on the United Kingdom continental shelf.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what progress is being made in reducing the number of fallow blocks on the United Kingdom continental shelf.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The number of fallow blocks, which stood at 125 at the beginning of 1989, had fallen to 88 blocks at the beginning of this year. Fourteen of these had been drilled or surrendered by the end of June. I am keeping in touch with operators and it is clear from their plans that progress will quicken during the second half of 1990, and that by the end of the year the number of fallow blocks will have fallen very substantially.

41. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of oil production in the current year on the United Kingdom continental shelf.

54. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of oil production in the current year on the United Kingdom continental shelf.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Total oil production in the first five months of 1990 was some 40·4 million tonnes. I expect production in the full year to be near the 1989 level.

35. Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of oil and gas production on the United Kingdom continental shelf between 1990 and 1994.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) today.

Combined Heat and Power

21. Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are the latest estimates from the Energy Technology Support Unit of the potential kilowatts that could be contributed from combined heat and power; by how much such potential would raise the overall thermal efficiency of electricity generation; and what percentage contributions this could make to a reduction in greenhouse gas emissions.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The latest estimate is that a potential of 25 billion kilowatt-hours annual generation from small scale CHP, operating at an efficiency of around 80 per cent. could reduce United Kingdom carbon dioxide emissions by 4 per cent.

This level of output equates to about 10 per cent. of present United Kingdom electricity demand or the output of about four large power stations.

39. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on combined heat and power schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to him on 18 December 1989, Official Report, column 8, and 29 January 1990, column 83.

British Coal

22. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Coal to discuss the coal industry's record on productivity.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Coal on a regular basis to discuss all aspects of the coal industry, including productivity in which the corporation has achieved excellent improvements since 1985.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the level of public support for British Coal since 1985-86.

Mr. Baldry: Since 1985-86 we have made over £3·5 billion in grants available to the corporation, and a further £6·5 billion is in the pipeline for the present financial reconstruction.

68. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much the Government have invested in British Coal since 1979.

75. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much the Government have invested in British Coal since 1979.

Mr. Baldry: We have financed over £7 billion investment in the British Coal Corporation since 1979.

57. Mr. Gow: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the advantages which would flow from the privatisation of British Coal.

Mr. Baldry: No decisions will be taken on the future structure of the coal industry until after the next election, but we remain firmly committed to privatisation as the best means to achieve a business able to meet the needs of its customers on a sound commercial basis.

53. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Coal to discuss the coal industry's record on productivity.

73. Mr. Ashby: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Coal to discuss the coal industry's record on productivity.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Coal on a regular basis to discuss all aspects of the coal industry, including productivity in which the corporation has achieved excellent improvements since 1985.

42. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to discuss the privatisation of British Coal with the president of the National Union of Mineworkers.

Mr. Wakeham: We have made it clear that we intend to privatise the coal industry after the next general election, and, when that time comes, we shall welcome the views of all interested parties.

36. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Coal regarding future employment levels in the industry.

58. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Coal regarding future employment levels in the industry.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Coal from time to time to discuss a range of issues.

North Sea Development

24. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many North sea development projects he has approved since June 1987.

48. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many North sea development projects he has approved since June 1987.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Since June 1987 I have approved 45 development projects on the United Kingdom continental shelf, comprising 16 oil fields, 12 gas fields, one condensate field and 16 incremental developments of fields already producing. I have also approved 14 onshore development projects during the same period.

Nuclear Electric

26. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to receive Nuclear Electric's first audited set of accounts.

Mr. Wakeham: Nuclear Electric is continuing work on a full review of its accounting policies. The company's opening report and accounts will be published later in the summer.

66. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of Nuclear Electric regarding the future of the company's power station programme.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of Nuclear Electric frequently to discuss various matters.

Rural Electricity Supplies

27. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the supply of electricity to remote rural areas.

Mr. Baldry: The Electricity Act 1989 gives all consumers, including these in rural areas, the right to receive a supply on reasonable terms from their public electricity supplier.

Disconnections

28. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current level of disconnection for debt of domestic electricity customers.

59. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current level of disconnection for debt of domestic electricity customers.

77. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the current level of disconnection for debt or domestic electricity customers.

Mr. Baldry: The latest available information shows that for the year ended 31 March 1990 the number of disconnections for non-payment of electricity bills in England and Wales was 67,421: the lowest annual level since records began.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the Director General of Gas Supply to discuss the level of disconnection for debt of domestic customers.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend and I meet the Director General of Gas Supply from time to time to discuss a range of issues of mutual interest. We have noted that the level of disconnection for debt is lower than at any time since records were first kept in 1977.

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Gas to discuss the level of disconnection for debt of domestic customers.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of British Gas from time to time to discuss a range of issues of mutual interest. We have noted that the level of disconnection for debt is lower than at any time since records were first kept in 1977.

Oil Industry

29. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to meet representatives of the oil industry to discuss green issues.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I regularly meet representatives of the oil industry to discuss a range of relevant issues.

Oil and Gas Production

30. Sir Antony Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met representatives of the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association to discuss prospects for further development of the United Kingdom continental shelf energy resources; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I maintain frequent contacts with the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association to discuss North sea issues, including the prospects for future developments. I have no plans to make a statement.

Clean Coal Burn

31. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Coal regarding Britain's future level of investment in clean coal-burning technologies.

45. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Coal regarding the level of investment in clean coal-burn technology.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of the British Coal Corporation regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

Landfill Gas

32. Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of current energy savings from the operation of landfill gas schemes.

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the level of current energy savings from the operation of landfill gas schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Current landfill gas utilisation schemes provide an energy saving equivalent to 160,000 tonnes of coal per annum.

Energy Efficiency

33. Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much was spent on the promotion of energy efficiency (a) in 1979 and (b) in 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Expenditure by my Department on energy efficiency programmes in 1979-80 was £2·4 million. The provision for expenditure by the Energy Efficiency Office in 1989-90 was £15 million.

40. Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what further steps he is considering to increase energy efficiency.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We are preparing a new scheme to provide grants for basic insulation measures in low-income households. In addition, we have received the report on the efficiency of electrical appliances which was commissioned by the Energy Efficiency Office and are considering the need for further action in this area.

In a further initiative I am currently undertaking a series of regional events at which I am promoting the benefits of energy efficiency to top decision-makers in industry and commerce. The Government's energy efficiency programmes and the need for further initiatives will be discussed in the White Paper on the environment to be published this autumn.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the number of domestic energy consumers to have received an energy efficiency improvement grant (a) currently and (b) in 1978; what were the costs involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: From September 1978 grants were available under the homes insulation scheme. In the period September to December 1978, grants were paid in respect of 94,400 dwellings in Great Britain at a cost of £3·8 million. In the period January 1979 to December 1989 grants were paid under that scheme in respect of 3,598,200 dwellings in Great Britain at a cost of £237·6 million. Additionally, it is estimated that nearly 700,000 homes were draughtproofed by community insulation projects operating under the Government's employment and training programmes from when they first commenced work in 1982 through to the end of 1989.

71. Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met Neighbourhood Energy Action and other bodies concerned with community insulation programmes regarding the home energy efficiency scheme.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for energy when he last met Neighbourhood Energy Action to discuss the home energy efficiency scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I last met the director of Neighbourhood Energy Action to discuss the scheme on 21 June, and have since met representatives from a number of trade associations.

67. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet Neighbourhood Energy Action to discuss the home energy efficiency scheme.

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to meet Neighbourhood Energy Action and others regarding progress on the home energy efficiency scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) earlier today.

Community Insulation Projects

37. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many community insulation projects are currently in operation.

38. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many community insulation projects are currently in operation.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There are currently some 311 such projects in operation.

Renewable Energy

43. Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much the Government plans to invest in the development of renewable sources of energy over the next four years.

61. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much the Government plan to invest in the development of renewable sources of energy over the next four years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Energy paper 55 "Renewable Energy In The UK: The Way Forward" sets out the Government's strategy for the development of renewable energy sources. The Department of Energy's budget provision for research and development into renewable energy for the year 1990-91 is £20·3 million.

Global Warming

44. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met his European counterparts to discuss global warming and possible answers in the energy field.

47. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next proposes to meet his European Community counterparts to discuss energy sector remedies for global warming.

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State discussed these matters with Community colleagues at the informal Energy Council in Rome on 16 July. I also expect these matters to be discussed with other EC Ministers both individually and at future Energy Councils.

Sizewell B

46. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he has undertaken with the nuclear installations inspectorate regarding the future of Sizewell B nuclear power station.

Mr. Baldry: There are frequent discussions between my Department and the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate on the safety of nuclear installations—including Sizewell B.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer of 5 July, Official Report, column 670 what consideration he has given to the implications of the decision of Nuclear Electric to charge costs related to Sizewell B for the exercise of his functions under section 97 and schedule 12 of the Electricity Act 1989.

Mr. Wakeham: I assume the hon. Member refers to Nuclear Electric's recent decision to write off to revenue £199 million of nugatory expenditure relating to the construction of a family of four PWR stations. These costs are not eligible for financial assistance under section 97 and schedule 12 of the Electricity Act 1989.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer of 5 July, Official Report, column 670, if he will meet the Director General of Electricity Supply to discuss the implications for the exercise of his tariff-setting powers of the accounting practices of Nuclear Electric in respect of revenue and capital costs relating to Sizewell B power station and the costs of electricity generation related to Magnox and AGR stations.

Mr. Wakeham: The accounting practices of Nuclear Electric referred to by the hon. Member have no implications for these functions of the Director General of Electricity Supply.

56. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much public money to date (a) has been spent on Sizewell B and (b) is committed currently; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

Power Stations

49. Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of National Power to discuss future power station configuration.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of National Power regularly to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Offshore Supplies Industry

50. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on trends on the level of the volume of orders for the United Kingdom offshore supplies industry in 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The total value of orders for the UKCS reported for 1988 was £2·5 billion and for 1989 was £3·9 billion. United Kingdom industry won 84 per cent. of the orders in 1988 and 81 per cent. of the much larger market in 1989.

EC Large Combustion Plant Directive

52. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what progress is being made in meeting the terms of the European Community large combustion plant directive in full.

55. Mr. John Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the Government's commitment to meeting the terms of the European Community large combustion plant directive in full.

Mr. Baldry: The Government are committed to complying with the large combustion plants directive. The electricity generators have identified a range of options to enable them to comply fully with their obligations under the directive. These include retrofitting power stations with FGD equipment, the use of low-sulphur fuels, the construction of new clean generating plant and increasing the efficiency of existing plant.

Electricity Privatisation

63. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairmen of the area distribution companies to discuss privatisation.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) earlier today.

Wave power

64. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received about the economics of electricity generated from wave power.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have received a number of letters about the economics of electricity generated from wave energy. Also, I have recently met Professor Salter to discuss wave energy and I shall be visiting him when I am next in Edinburgh.

Nuclear Power

70. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to publish his response to the Select Committee on Energy's report on "The Cost of Nuclear Power".

Mr. Wakeham: The Government will respond shortly to the Committee's report.

Britoil

74. Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has anything to add to the Government's response to the first report of the Energy Select Committee this Session.

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has anything to add to the Government's response to the first report of the Energy Select Committee during the current Session of Parliament.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement I made last Friday, Official Report, col. 1303-14.

Offshore Licensing

76. Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the level of interest so far recorded in the 12th round of offshore licensing.

Mr. Peter Morrison: A high level of interest across a wide range of companies has been shown in the 12th round. Strong competition for blocks is expected. I look forward to a successful round.

Gas Prices

78. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consideration he has given to the implications of gas price rises during the next 15 years for energy policy.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Gas prices during the next 15 years will depend on the availability of supplies and the level of demand over the period. I am confident, given the large reserves available both in United Kindom and in western Europe, that gas will remain highly competitive with other fuels.

Electricity Prices

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman and women of the 12 electricity consumer committees to discuss future domestic price increases.

Mr. Baldry: The electricity consumer committees have been established under the new regime to advise the Director General of Electricity Supply. He will be monitoring the performance of the regional electricity companies in meeting the price controls contained in their licences and will draw on the advice of his consumer committees in performing his duties.

Energy Conservation

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what measures his Department is promoting to promote energy conservation.

Mr. Morrison: The Energy Efficiency Office (EEO) offers a substantial range of programmes and initiatives to encourage consumers to improve their energy efficiency. The EEO's current main programmes are as follows:

—the best practice programme to give independent and authoritative information and advice backed by thorough technical research;

—an enhanced regional programme, stimulating the development and application of energy management skills and techniques.

Mersey Barrage

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the current status of the Mersey barrage project.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the construction of the Mersey barrage.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I am pleased to welcome the recent proposal for a third stage of feasibility studies for a tidal energy barrage by the Mersey Barrage Company, the details of which are now being considered by my Department. A Government contribution of up to £1·5 million, anticipated to be 50 per cent. of the study costs, will be made available subject to satisfactory contractual negotiations.

I have also established an interdepartmental ministerial committee, under my chairmanship, which will meet for the first time later this week, to consider the wider, non-energy and regional implications of the proposed barrage. The Mersey barrage is a major renewable energy project, which could provide over a half of 1 per cent. of the United Kingdom's present electricity needs.

Mersey Estuary (Gas Find)

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assistance he is giving to the development of the Mersey estuary gas find, officially listed as block 110/13; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I understand that Hamilton Brothers Oil and Gas Ltd. has recently made a significant gas find in the Mersey estuary.

The results from the well are still being evaluated. Further appraisal will be necessary to establish what the development prospects are.

Electricity Boards (Rate of Return)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list those electricity area boards which have failed to achieve his rate of return target.

Mr. Baldry: Two of the 12 regional electricity companies in England and Wales reported in their annual report and accounts for 1989-90 that they achieved their rate of return target. They were Yorkshire Electricity plc and South Western Electricity plc.

Renewables (Research)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to the answer of 6 June, Official Report, columns 617-18, if he will give for each year from 1979-80 to 1990-91 spending figures for research funded by his Department into renewables consistent with those given in that answer.

Mr. Wakeham: The figures are given in the table:

Renewables

£ million

	Money terms	1990-91 real terms	Per cent. of total R&D expenditure
1979-80	8·2	17·5	4·7
1980-81	11·3	20·4	5·1
1981-82	15·3	25·1	6·4
1982-83	12·7	19·5	5·2
1983-84	11·9	17·4	5·0
1984-85	14·9	20·8	6·4
1985-86	13·6	18·0	6·1
1986-87	12·5	16·0	6·5
1987-88	16·1	19·6	9·1
1988-89	16·3	18·5	8·6
1989-90	17·9	19·1	10·0
1990-91	20·3	20·3	11·3

Notes:
1979-80 and 1980-81 figures are taken from Departmental records and do not include associated Departmental staff costs.
1981-82 to 1987-88 are taken from the "Annual Review of Government Funded R&D" and cover R&D plus associated Departmental staff costs (ie Frascati R&D). 1988-89 figures are calculated on the same basis.
1989-90 figures are forecast outturn and 1990-91 figures are taken from Estimates. These do not include associated Departmental staff costs. The 1989-90 figure may be subject to end year adjustment.

Electrical Goods

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the representations he has received from private electricity goods retailing companies regarding competition with the electrical goods retailing activities of the electricity distribution companies.

Mr. Baldry: I have no representations on appliance retailing to report. In this activity the regional electricity companies are of course governed by general competition law and overseen by the Director General of Fair Trading.

Electricity Generators

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received from prospective independent electricity generators regarding the proposed gearing ratio of National Power and PowerGen.

Mr. Baldry: Discussions with National Power and PowerGen about their capital structures are continuing. Appropriate account will be taken of representations from independent generators.

Public Bodies

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all chairmen or women and vice-chairmen or women of non-departmental public bodies in Wales who are also members of at least one other such body.

Mr. Wakeham [holding answer 16 July 1990]: No chairman or woman or vice-chairman or woman of any of the non-departmental public bodies in Wales, listed in the written reply by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales to the hon. Member on 11 July 1990 at columns 245-48, is a member of any such body for which I hold responsibility.

DEFENCE

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance.

To assist in obtaining better value for money through broadening its competitive base, the Ministry of Defence has continued to provide a new suppliers service responsible for encouraging and assisting small firms to compete for defence business. Over the past 12 months the new suppliers service has attended a wide range of seminars and "meet-the-buyer" events and has given advice to about 2,200 companies on how to sell to the Ministry of Defence. The Ministry of Defence has also continued to produce a fortnightly contracts bulletin, which includes notice of almost all contracts the Department expects to place valued at more than £500,000. Since 1 January 1990 clothing and textile requirements have been included in the bulletin at a lower threshold of £250,000. The bulletin will shortly include details of sub-contract opportunities, which will be of particular value to small companies. The success of these measures to encourage a widening of our supplier base is in part reflected by our having placed 67 per cent. of headquarters contracts by value by competition or otherwise by reference to market forces in 1989-90. Details of payments made by the Ministry of Defence to small firms in 1989-90 are not yet available.

In addition, the small firms research initiative aims to encourage small firms to bid for research work. In 1989-90, 36 research contracts were placed with small firms at a total value of £1·3 million.

Government Contracts (Profit Formula)

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the report by the review board on its sixth general review of the profit formula for Government contracts.

Mr. Alan Clark: The main recommendation in the report is for an increase, based on comparability, in the overall target rate of return on non-competitive contracts.

After careful consideration I have concluded that we cannot adopt that recommendation and that the current target rate should remain in force. This decision implies no criticism of the review board. It is based on my assessment in present circumstances that the maintenance of the existing target rate for such contracts will ensure adequate industrial resources to meet our current needs.

The report raises a number of other issues relating to the operation of the profit formula and the pricing of non-competitive contracts. My officials will be pursuing these with representatives of the CBI and with the review board, as appropriate.

A copy of the review board's report has been placed in the Library.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Interviews (Tape-recording)

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Attorney-General what assessment he makes of the effect of tape-recorded interviews of suspects upon the speed of trials, the delays in bringing cases to trial and the number of pleas of guilty being entered.

The Attorney-General: The effect of tape-recorded interviews has not been assessed pending the completion of the nationwide introduction of the scheme.

Armagh Courthouses (Union Flag)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Attorney-General for what reasons the Union flag is no longer flown on the flagpole on top of the courthouses in Armagh city; whether the Union flag being flown on a pole at ground level at the courthouse has been damaged; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The flagpole on top of the courthouse at Armagh is no longer used for safety reasons. This position affords little or no protection when raising or lowering the Union flag and staff were in danger of falling. The new flagpole was fixed to the inward side of the perimeter wall. A flag was damaged on barbed wire at the new location. Two strands of barbed wire have been removed, and a new flag supplied. It has been flown subsequently without difficulty.

Factortame

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) of 26 June, Official Report, columns 141-42, if he will make a further statement on the juridical implications of Factortame, in the light of the decision of the House of Lords.

The Attorney-General: The Factortame case was reinstated in the House of Lords on 2 July and the hearing concluded on 9 July. It has been indicated that the House of Lords has decided in principle to grant interim relief in favour of the applicants to the effect that the Secretary of State for Transport should not withhold registration in respect of any fishing vessel if the owner is an "original applicant" for interim relief who is disentitled to registration under section 14 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 by reason only of a failure to meet the conditions requiring directors and shareholders of owning companies to be resident and domiciled in the United Kingdom. It would be inappropriate to comment further on the House of Lords' decision until it has determined the form of its order and it has given its fully reasoned judgment.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the achievements of the Lord Chancellor's Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors these achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

The Attorney-General: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance.

The Lord Chancellor has implemented a number of policies designed to ensure that all litigants enjoy the greatest possible quality and speed of service from the civil courts. However, as these policies are not specifically targeted on small businesses, no performance indicators are kept in this regard.

The Lord Chancellor's Department has continued to encourage the use of small businesses as suppliers in line with the Government purchasing initiative. Within the last 12 months guidance issued by the Department of Employment—Central Unit on Purchasing has been circulated to all purchasing and supply staff, and there has been participation in a "meet the buyer" event. The Department's estimated total expenditure with small firms —fewer than 200 employees—in 1989-90 was £14 million.

THE ARTS

Works of Art (Disposal)

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will specify the allocations made to public institutions in the United Kingdom during the half year ended 30 June of individual works of art and museum objects pre-eminent for national, scientific, historical or artistic interest which have been accepted in satisfaction of inheritance tax or capital transfer tax, together with information, where applicable, as to conditions or wishes expressed by testators or executors in the matter of allocation; whether he will list the works of art and museum objects which are still awaiting allocation, with the respective dates of their acceptance in satisfaction of inheritance tax or capital transfer tax; and whether a press notice will be issued from his Department covering the information given in his reply.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The information the hon. Gentleman requests is as follows:

Item	To whom allocated	Conditions—wishes expressed
Collection of Anglo-Saxon and medieval coins	Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge	Conditional
Collection of modern paintings	Abbot Hall Art Gallery, Cumbria	Conditional
"Allée à Chantilly" by Cezanne	National Gallery	Wish to go to the National Gallery expressed
Painting by van der Heyden	National Gallery	Conditional
Woodcut by Edvard Munch	University of Manchester-Whitworth Art Gallery	Conditional

Items awaiting allocation	Date of acceptance
"Farm Cart with Horse in Harness" by Constable	14 February 1990
Harpsichord	14 February 1990
"Richmond près Londres" by Corot	29 March 1990
Portrait by Beechey	20 April 1990
Painting by Lucas de Heere	20 April 1990
Two portraits by Gainsborough, one by Rubens and a landscape by Seghers	20 April 1990

NATIONAL FINANCE

Tax System (Indexation)

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of the amount of revenue that would accrue to the Government from fiscal drag if the tax system were simply indexed in the 1991 Budget.

Mr. Ryder: Chapter 2 of the 1990-91 "Financial Statement and Budget Report" shows total taxes and national insurance contributions, including the community charge, rising from £206 billion in 1990-91 to £216 billion in 1991-92, on the assumption that the tax system is indexed in the 1991 Budget. This allows for the effects of real fiscal drag, and also for the build-up of effects of the 1990 Budget and earlier Budgets, including independent taxation for husbands and wives.

Excise Duties

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effect of not indexing excise duties in the 1991 Budget, by product, on (a) inflation and (b) revenues in 1991-92 and a full year.

Mr. Ryder: The effects of revalorising excise duties on the revenue yield and the retail prices index in 1991-92 and 1992-93 will be published in the autumn statement. The information requested will not be readily available before then.

Income Tax

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the amount of income tax the Exchequer would forgo in 1990-91 (a) if all income from savings were exempted from the tax and (b) if income tax were chargeable only to higher rate taxpayers on such income.

Mr. Ryder: The direct revenue cost of exempting from income tax the investment income received by individual savers, including interest received on bank and building society accounts, national savings and dividends received from companies, is estimated to be about £10·5 billion. If the income from savings of higher rate taxpayers remained chargeable to income tax, at their marginal rate of tax, the cost would be reduced to about £5 billion.

Incomes

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give (a) the gross incomes before tax and (b) the net incomes after tax of each income decile for each year since 1978-79 and also for the top 1 per cent. and the top 5 per cent. of the income distribution, the income level which is the dividing line between the deciles for the top 1 per cent. and 5 per cent. in each case for each year and the average income for each group during each year.

Mr. Ryder: The latest available analyses of the distributions of before and after tax incomes relate to the years 1978-79, 1981-82 and 1984-85 and were published in the November 1987 issue of "Economic Trends", No. 409, a copy of which is available in the Library. The additional details and data for other years requested by the hon. Member could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Local Authority Transactions

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish an updated version of table 6.7 in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1990-91".

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest outturn figures for 1988-89 and 1989-90 are shown in the table. These outturn figures are subject to revision as more information becomes available. It is not the normal practice to publish forecasts other than at Budget time.

	1988-89 outturn £ billion	1989-90 outturn £ billion
Receipts
Domestic rates and community charge	8·5	9·5
Non-domestic rates	10·4	11·2
Current grants from central government	23·8	24·7
Capital grants from central government	0·8	2·6
Other	5·6	5·9
Total receipts	49·2	53·9
Expenditure
Current expenditure on goods and services	36·4	39·1
Current grants and subsidies	5·8	6·3
Interest	4·6	4·8
Capital expenditure and net lending	2·6	4·9
Total expenditure	49·5	55·2

Taxpayers

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of the number of taxpayers divided into basic rate and top rate and by sex.

Mr. Ryder: Estimates for 1990-91 are as follows:

Millions

	Basic rate (but not higher rate)	Higher rate	Total
Males	15·0	1·4	16·4
Females	9·5	0·3	9·8
Total	24·5	1·7	26·2

The estimates are based on a projection of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes and are provisional.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the expenditure by programme in England to which (a) Scottish block expenditure, and (b) Welsh block expenditure are held to be comparable for the purposes of the territorial allocation formula; and if he will place in the Library a document explaining the implications for the operation of this formula of the introduction of the new planning total.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The annual public expenditure White Paper shows the individual programme elements of both the Scottish block and the Welsh block—table 15.1 of Cm. 1015 and table 16.1 of Cm. 1016: housing and education. It is the corresponding English programmes which are held to be comparable. The introduction of the new planning total affects the programmes within the Scottish and Welsh blocks in the same way as it affects the corresponding English programmes.

Treasury Model

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effects the Treasury model currently incorporates concerning the impact on the non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment of the differences in regional levels of unemployment; and what is the scale of these effects.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In common with other macroeconomic models of the United Kingdom economy, the Treasury model is not disaggregated to a regional level.

Retail Prices Index

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement about the recent report of the Retail Prices Index Advisory Committee.

Mr. Major: As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) on 4 July, at column 577, the report examines how the price of holidays might be incorporated into the retail prices index and recommends that the Central Statistical Office should begin to collect relevant data and examine a new methodology which the committee has developed. However, there is no recommendation to include holiday prices in the retail prices index for the moment. I am asking the Central Statistical Office to put in hand the data collection and further work necessary to determine whether it will be possible to overcome the methodological problems associated with incorporating a holiday price index into the retail prices index in due course.

The report also examines the way financial services are taken into account in the retail prices index. On this it recommends that the annual fees which are being introduced for the holders of certain credit cards should not be covered by the retail prices index, and that any supplements which retailers might charge to customers using credit cards should also be ignored in constructing the index, at least for the present. It is also recommended that charges for personal banking services and transaction charges incurred by households buying and selling investments should be excluded from the index, but that the coverage of insurance should be extended to include personal accident and "protection-only" life insurance. I have decided to accept these recommendations.

The full report is being published today as Cm. 1156 and copies are available in the Vote Office.

Taxes and Benefits

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer of 5 July, Official Report, column 699, when he will be able to provide up-to-date figures on the same basis as those provided to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East in his answer of 8 January, Official Report, columns 559-64, revising his figures to include an estimate of the effects of the introduction of the community charge; and what estimate he has made to date of the effect on the tax burden of the introduction of the community charge.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 July 1990]: It will be possible to provide estimates of the effects of the introduction of the community charge on the basis requested when relevant data from the family expenditure survey for 1990, the first year of the charge's operation in England and Wales, are available.

Stamp Duty

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show for each stamp duty office in the United Kingdom the income for stamp duty, the number of transactions, the other functions and the other income, for each of the last three years;

(2) if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show for each stamp duty office in the United Kingdom the sums of stamp duty raised on share transfers in each of the last three years and the number of such transactions in each of those years;

(3) if he will publish his estimate of the sums saved, in cash and percentage terms, in (a) the sums raised and (b) the number of transactions in each stamp duty office in the United Kingdom when those offices move to a system of paperless transactions in 1992;

(4) what is the anticipated cost of retraining staff in the Edinburgh stamp duty centre to comply with Northern Ireland stamp duty legislation;

(5) if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show the functions common to all stamp duty centres in the United Kingdom and indicate any other functions which are carried out in each of the others which are not common, with particular reference to the Belfast office;

(6) what is his estimate of the number of staff required to handle Northern Ireland stamp duty centre transactions in (a) 1991, (b) 1992 and (c) 1993;

(7) if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show the numbers of staff employed in each of the stamp duty centres in the United Kingdom at present and the total salaries of such staff in the current and past two years;

(8) which of the functions of the Belfast stamp office he proposes to transfer to Edinburgh;

(9) if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show how the anticipated saving of £160,000 by the transfer of functions of the Belfast stamp office to Edinburgh arises; whether the calculations take account of (a) extra training, (b) increased postage and (c) the cost of increased liaison between the stamp duty office in Edinburgh and Northern Ireland Government Departments; and if he will show the sums estimated for each of the three above headings and for each Northern Ireland Government Department for the three years after his proposed transfer of functions;

(10) how urgent cases, requiring immediate registration to secure priority under section 4 of the Registration of Deeds Act (Northern Ireland) 1970, will be dealt with after transfer of the functions of the Northern Ireland stamp duty office in Belfast to Edinburgh;

(11) what estimate he has made of the increased costs to (a) the legal profession and (b) the general public if the proposed transfer of functions of the Belfast stamp office goes ahead.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 17 July 1990]: More time is needed to collect the necessary information and I shall write to the hon. Member when it is available and place a copy in the Library.

Privatisation

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate (a) the number of individual shareholders in the United Kingdom and (b) the number who are direct shareholders in privatised companies.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 23 July 1990]: There are now nearly 11 million individual shareholders in the United Kingdom and over 5 million who are direct shareholders in privatised companies.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the amount of corporation tax received from privatised companies in 1989-90.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The companies privatised since 1979 paid about £1½ billion in corporation tax in 1989-90.

South Yorkshire (GDP)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much gross domestic product per capita in south Yorkshire falls below (a) the Community average and (b) the United Kingdom average.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 23 July 1990]: In 1987, the latest year for which county figures are available, and taking the Economic Community average as 100, the figures are, based on purchasing power parities—

	Average
Economic Community	100
United Kingdom	107
South Yorkshire	87

Community figures are based on estimates published by the statistical office of the European Communities.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much tax relief goes on mortgage tax relief (a) at basic rate and (b) in excess of the basic rate in 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 23 July 1990]: Provisional estimates are given in the table; 1990-91 estimates are based on the assumption that interest rates remain at their current levels.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Year	Total cost of relief	Cost of relief at rates in excess of the basic rate of income tax
	£ million	£ million
1989-90	6,900	430
1990-91	8,000	510

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the Government estimate gross domestic product will be in 1990-91 and 1991-92 both in current and constant prices.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The information requested can be calculated from table 2.1 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1990".

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many people would pay more tax than they do at the present time if capital gains tax exemption were at the same level as the personal allowance; what is their average pre-tax income and the distribution of income; and what would be the average and distribution of increased capital gains tax payments;

(2) how many people would pay more tax if capital gains tax exemptions were £3,000; what is their average pre-tax income and the distribution of income; and what would be the average and distribution of increased payments.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 23 July 1990]: It is tentatively estimated that about 260,000 individuals and trusts would pay more capital gains tax in 1990-91 disposals if the annual exempt amount were reduced from £5,000 to either £3,000 or £3,005—the 1990-91 personal allowance—assuming a proportionate reduction in the annual exempt amount for trusts. About 100,000 of these 260,000 losers are not expected to pay capital gains tax on 1990-91 disposals under current rules. The full-year yield from this change is estimated to be about £70 million, implying an average additional payment of about £275 per loser, but estimates of the distribution of extra payments are not available. The estimates allow for some change in taxpayers' behaviour in response to the reduced annual exempt amount, but do not allow for possible short-term effects. No allowance has been made for any change in the treatment of capital gains of companies which are taxed within corporation tax.

Estimates of the income distribution of the 260,000 losers are not available. Some information about the taxable income of capital gains taxpayers in 1985-86 is available in table 11.5 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1989".

HOME DEPARTMENT

Departmental Property

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what steps are taken to make available properties disposed of by his Department to housing associations or local authorities;

(2) how many homes have been sold by his Department since the beginning of 1989 and in the last three months; and what criteria are used in deciding to whom the properties will be disposed;

(3) what policy guidelines exist for his Department in dealing with empty properties.

Mr. Waddington: The Department sold 2,575 prison officers' quarters during the 18-month period 1 January 1989 to 30 June 1990, of which 2,415 were sold to officers under the Department's discount sales scheme and 160 were sold as vacant houses on the open market. During the last three months of that period 223 quarters were sold, of which 194 were sold to officers and 29 were sold on the open market.

Most quarters are sold to officers in occupation under the Department's discount sale scheme. The policy in dealing with vacant quarters is that, unless they are to be retained for essential reallocation, redevelopment or security reasons, they are placed on the open market for sale to the general public at the best price obtainable. No special steps are taken to make such properties available to housing associations or local authorities.

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the money realised from any sales of domestic properties by his Department is treated.

Mr. Waddington: Receipts from the sale of prison officer's quarters are appropriations-in-aid and, as such, are offset against planned expenditure on the prison service. Any receipts in excess of the anticipated level go to the Consolidated Fund.

Warning and Monitoring

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what improvements have been made to monitoring posts since the review of warning and monitoring was completed; what the costs of such improvements have been in each of the years 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90; what further improvements are planned or under consideration; and what the costs of any such further improvements are expected to be in each of the years 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. John Patten: Since the review of warning and monitoring was completed, a supply of replacement generator sets has been made available to those monitoring posts whose equipment had become unserviceable. The cost was £26,000 in 1989-90. A study has been undertaken into the provision of ventilation systems and field trials are planned to evaluate costs and effectiveness.

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what possible replacements for AWDREY and other Royal Observer Corps instrument systems have been identified; and how much such replacement systems are expected to cost.

Mr. John Patten: Possible replacement systems for AWDREY and other Royal Observer Corps instrument systems have been identified. The systems are based on seismic, optical and electromagnetic pulse detectors but further development is required before the full costs can be estimated.

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what options are being considered for the realignment of United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation sector boundaries; and what estimates have been made of the costs of implementing these options.

Mr. John Patten: Several options for revising the group and sector warnings and monitoring boundaries to conform with the home defence regions are under consideration. Work is continuing on estimating their costs.

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any progress has been made regarding the setting up of new systems to convey data within the United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation.

Mr. John Patten: A study is being conducted into the use of an enhanced emergency communications network to convey data within the United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation. This study will take account of the scope for introducing new information technology for both administrative purposes and wartime operations.

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what options are being considered for the collocation of UKWMO and Royal Observer Corps headquarters; and what estimates have been made of the costs of implementing these options.

Mr. John Patten: The Property Services Agency has identified three collocation options for basing the United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation and Royal Observer Corps headquarters at Cowley, Oxford. A full feasibility study is to be conducted which will include estimates of the costs of each option.

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any conclusions have been reached regarding replacement RADIAC instrumentation for monitoring of nuclear fallout; and what costs have so far been identified.

Mr. John Patten: No conclusions have been reached on replacing the RADIAC instrumentation for monitoring fallout. The costs will be identified when the customer requirements have been established.

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what options are being considered for the refurbishment and replacement of warning sirens; and what estimates have been made of the costs of implementing these options;

(2) whether any alternative to the use of sirens for warning of air attack is under consideration.

Mr. John Patten: A study of the refurbishment and replacement of sirens has concluded that it would be expensive as a warning option. Further research is therefore being conducted on the cost effectiveness of alternative warning options such as the use of radio and television.

Irish Prisoners

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners from Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic are currently serving a prison sentence in England and Wales.

Mr. Waddington: According to the records held centrally, on 31 March 1990 about 320 sentenced prisoners in prison service establishments in England and Wales who were citizens of the United Kingdom or whose citizenship was unknown were known to have been born in Northern Ireland.

The recording of nationality in the records held centrally for citizens of the Republic of Ireland is not completely reliable because it depends upon information provided by the prisoner. On 31 March 1990 about 440 sentenced prisoners in establishments in England and Wales were recorded as citizens of or born in the Republic of Ireland.

Police Computer

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the new police computer, known as PNC2, will be operational; and what its capacity will be.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Present plans are for PNC2 to come into operational service by the end of the year. The system's processors will be capable of handling 62 millions of instructions per second. Its main memory will be capable of storing 192 million bytes of data; it will also have sufficient disk capacity to store 80,000 million bytes of data.

Criminal Records

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what categories of information are considered admissible for entry on the criminal record system; what restrictions are applied; and what is the purpose of information that is not factual.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information included in the national collection of criminal records is set out in form NIB 74. A copy of the form is available in the Library, as part of the memorandum submitted by the Home Office to the Home Affairs Committee in connection with its recent inquiry into the collection and use of criminal records.

The national collection of criminal records is maintained by the police to meet its operational needs. All the information contained in it is used primarily for this purpose.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when guidelines will be issued to chief constables to assist them in deciding whether or not to allow access to police records; and whether there are any plans to update Home Office circular No. 45/1986.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Guidance to chief officers of police about disclosure of information from police records is contained in a number of Home Office circulars including HOC 45/1986 which is scheduled for revision next year.

Caledonian Sector

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when full responsibility for Caledonian sector will be transferred from the Scottish Office to the Home Office; whether this will result in staff redeployment; and what is the expected net cost or gain to be made from this transfer.

Mr. John Patten: Full responsibility for Caledonian sector will be transferred when the detailed arrangements have been finalised. The staff affected and the departmental trade union sides have been consulted, although no staff redeployment is likely to be involved. There is no expected net cost or gain from this proposed transfer.

Prison Governors Association

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reply to the letter from the Prison Governors Association dated 15 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: We have no record of a letter of 15 June from the Prison Governors Association although I understand that a copy of the letter sent by the vice-chairman of the association on 4 June about the reorganisation of the prison service was included in the association's bulletin to its members of 15 June. I replied to the letter on 18 June.

Mental Illness

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidance to chief constables that the police should use cautions more widely when dealing with mentally disturbed offenders.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A forthcoming circular on provision for mentally disordered offenders will emphasise the need to divert such offenders from the formal criminal justice system wherever possible. Cautioning is included among the recommended methods of diverting mentally disturbed offenders from the criminal justice system, the importance of which is emphasised in the circular.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to facilitate the transfer of mentally ill prisoners from prisons to mental hospitals.

Mr. Waddington: The prime consideration is to seek to avoid mentally ill people unnecessarily being sent to prison in the first place. The revised Home Office booklet "The Sentence of the Court" and a circular to be issued soon to the police and probation services as well as the courts have the aim of encouraging the diversion of mentally disordered offenders into the care of the health or social services.

The recommendations of the working group of Home Office and Department of Health officials on mentally disordered offenders in the prison system, a copy of whose report is in the Library, include measures designed to facilitate transfer to hospital and these have been brought to the attention of prison medical officers. Consolidated guidance on transfer procedures under the provisions of the Mental Health Act 1983 is to be issued soon to the prison medical service in conjunction with a review of the standing order on health care. This guidance emphasises the need for action to be initiated promptly, including arrangements for a consultant to make an assessment visit, when it is thought that a prisoner's transfer to hospital may be warranted.

The number of mentally disordered prisoners including those who were mentally ill transferred to hospital under section 47 or 48 of the Mental Health Act 1983 has doubled over the last six years.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there has been an increase or decrease in the number of psychiatric referrals of prison inmates in the last two years.

Mr. Waddington: The number of inmates referred to visiting or consultant psychiatrists rose from 12,465 in 1986-87 to 16,937 in 1988-89. That represents an increase of 36 per cent.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the number of mentally ill people who are in prison.

Mr. Waddington: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) on 5 July at columns 639-40.

Prison Medical Service

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to incorporate the prison medical service within the national health service.

Mr. Waddington: There are no plans to do so. The prison medical service already makes exclusive use of national health service in-patient and out-patient facilities, general practitioners and specialists. However, there will be an opportunity to look afresh at the organisation of the prison medical service when we have the findings of the efficiency scrutiny announced on 20 December 1989 at columns 274-75. The scrutiny team's report is expected shortly.

Prisoners (Suicide)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners who committed suicide in the last decade underwent psychiatric treatment or assessment before entering custody.

Mr. Waddington: The information is not available. Prison medical officers would normally be aware of any previous psychiatric treatment or assessment only if the inmate chose to disclose the details at interview on reception. The only totally reliable source of information would be any confidential report on an inmate's psychiatric condition prepared by a consultant psychiatrist at the request of the court.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what suicide prevention procedure is recommended for Her Majesty's prisons; what changes in standing orders have been made or are proposed to be made to accommodate this; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Circular instruction 20/1989, a copy of which is in the Library, describes the range of measures taken by the prison service in England and Wales to try to prevent suicide and self-injury among prisoners. The main elements are systematic screening and assessment; suitable location and supervision; sympathetic and supportive contact with staff and others; reducing the opportunities for suicide by physical prevention measures; and ensuring staff awareness.

The prison service is constantly looking to improve its suicide prevention strategy. Among present initiatives are:

a planned trial of the use of closed circuit television; the continuation of the "family ties" programme, including the installation of cardphones in category C establishments, a proposed experiment at Winchester prison in the use of cardphones by remand prisoners and a pilot scheme to reduce routine censorship in category B—non-dispersal—establishments; and encouraging the increasing involvement of the Samaritans.

In addition, Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons has been asked to review the effectiveness of the prison service's policy and procedures for the prevention of suicide and self-harm, with particular reference to the risks posed by mentally disturbed prisoners. Judge Tumin is expected to report in the autumn.

Traffic Wardens

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to transfer the functions of traffic wardens to the private sector; and if he expects this service to be operated by existing or by new businesses.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no plans to transfer the functions of traffic wardens to the private sector.

Channel Islands

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to institute a review of the judicial system in the Channel Islands to fulfil his responsibilities to ensure that good government is being maintained.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have no reason to believe such a review is necessary.

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what rights of appeal British citizens have to British courts and Government Departments when they have a grievance against courts in the Channel Islands;

(2) how he ensures that the United Kingdom citizens have the same rights of legal review of court decisions in the Channel Islands as on the mainland in cases where appeal judges from the English bench are involved.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Channel Islands are not within the United Kingdom. They have their own courts and courts of appeal with full jurisdiction. Senior barristers from the United Kingdom, appointed by the Queen, serve on the panel from which appeal court judges are drawn. There is a final avenue of appeal to the judicial committee of the Privy Council.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Waddington: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance. The success of these policies is demonstrated by the latest statistics which show a record increase in the number of businesses registered for VAT of 1,700 a week during 1989. Over the decade the overall increase has been 373,000.

Over the past 12 months, the Home Office has helped small firms by continuing to develop and improve the information, access and opportunities necessary to enable them to tender for our business. We have revised and reissued a booklet entitled "Selling to the Home Office", which, together with the list of contact points for each of our local establishments throughout England and Wales, provides details of our typical purchasing needs and guidance for potential suppliers on where and how to make the initial approach. This has been reinforced by the provision of a central point of contact in the Home Office for general supplier inquiries and representation at exhibitions and seminars held locally for small firms.

Home Office performance indicators on purchasing are directed to securing better value for the money we spend, and do not differentiate between the size of firms to which contracts are awarded or provide statistical information about the business placed with small firms.

Broadcasting

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received any representations about the quality of the news and current affairs service provided by the managing editors of Greater London Radio, Greater Manchester Radio, and BBC Radio WM for the communities which they serve; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received concerning the future of Greater Manchester Radio.

Mr. Waddington: So far this year I have received nine letters from hon. Members and four letters from members of the public expressing support for BBC local radio stations in metropolitan areas.

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the current number of listeners to Greater London Radio.

Mr. Waddington: Any information on listenership is derived from the BBC which will be able to give my hon. Friend its latest estimates and details of the methodology employed.

Data Matching

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce safeguards to protect the rights of the individual against the dangers of data matching; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Not at present. I will consider carefully any recommendation the Data Protection Registrar may make when his consideration of this issue is complete.

British Overseas Citizens

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances east African holders of former United Kingdom passports, which did not give a right of abode in the United Kingdom, who have adopted east African citizenships are permitted to renounce those citizenships and to resume the status of British overseas citizen.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I will write to the hon. Member.

Police Complaints Authority

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any new appointment has been made to the Police Complaints Authority.

Mr. Waddington: Mr. Edward H. Wignall, who retired from the Electricity Council in September 1989, has accepted my invitation to serve as a member of the Police Complaints Authority. He will take up his post on 30 July 1990. This appointment is being made to fill a vacancy created by the departure of one of the members from the authority to take up the offer of a Harkness fellowship.

Prisoners (Grievance Procedures)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has reached a decision on the recommendations made in the report of the working group on grievance procedures concerning the introduction of new procedures for handling prisoners' requests and complaints and the possible establishment of a prison ombudsman.

Mr. Waddington: I have decided that, in the light of experience gained in pilot schemes at Hull, Lindholme and Wakefield prisons, the new procedures which have been developed for handling prisoners' requests and complaints, and which are intended to replace the present petitioning system, should be introduced in all establishments on 25 September to coincide with the reorganisation of prison service headquarters. I have also decided to accept the working group's recommendation that it would be sensible to defer a decision on whether or not to establish a prisons ombudsman until there has been time for the new requests/complaints procedures to bed down and for their impact to be assessed.

Community Service and Probation Orders

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest information he has on the proportion of community service orders and probation orders successfully completed; and what was the proportion which were followed by reconvictions for further offences, relative to persons discharged from custodial sentences.

Mr. John Patten: A total of 79 per cent. of the 43,150 probation orders that ended in 1988 were successfully completed—ran their full course, or were terminated early for good progress or were replaced by a conditional discharge order. The specified hours were completed in 72 per cent. of the 35,600 community service orders which ended in 1988.

Source: Probation Statistics, England and Wales, 1988.

The latest available comparative statistics about convictions for further offences relate to 1979—"Reconvictions of those given probation orders", Home Office statistical bulletin 34/86. Comparisons with custody must be interpreted with caution because the figures relate to the two years following release rather than the two years following the start of a community-based sentence and because they reflect the characteristics of the offenders involved as well as the influence of the type of sentence. A new study using the most recent data is planned.

Proportion of persons reconvicted of a standard list offence within two years of starting an order (January-February 1979)

	Males under 21	Males aged 21 and over	Females
Probation order	56	43	27
Community service order	58	46	37
Within two years of discharge from a custodial sentence in 1979	69	51	42

Firearms Certificates

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to acquire the information required to total the number of firearms certificates and shotgun certificates which were in force in England and Wales on 31 December 1989.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The number of firearm and shotgun certificates on issue at 31 December 1988 was published in Home Office statistical bulletin 18/89, a copy of which is in the Library. Information relating to 31 December 1989 will also be published soon in a Home Office statistical bulletin.

Birmingham Public Inquiry Office

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the most recent estimate he has made of the cost of (a) establishing and equipping and (b) operating the proposed Birmingham public inquiry office; and when he now estimates it will be opened.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 5 July 1990]: The estimated total cost of furnishing and equipping the office is £44,000, of which some £14,000 has already been spent. Annual running costs are expected to be in the region of £140,000. We intend to open the office when the necessary funding can be made available.

Immigration

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a woman European Community student is entitled to bring her husband into the United Kingdom if the husband is not a European Community national.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 23 July 1990]: European Community law confers right of entry upon spouses and certain other family members of nationals of other EC states who are exercising EC treaty rights in this country. If an EC national is receiving a service which is provided as an economic activity then, under EC law, he or she is exercising those rights. This is normally the case where a student is paying for education at a private college, but not where the education is provided as part of the state education system.

TRANSPORT

Thornbridge Viaduct, M6

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce an immediate ban on Sunday working on the Thornbridge viaduct of the M6 motorway, Birmingham; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: No. The contractors are encouraged to complete the work as quickly as possible in accordance with restrictions laid down within their contract.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what form of compensation is available to residents whose homes are covered in dust from the work on the Thornbridge viaduct of the M6 motorway, Birmingham.

Mr. Freeman: The Department's standard conditions of contract require contractors to be insured against third party claims. The contract for the reconstruction of the concrete verges of both carriageways of the Thornbridge viaduct is a standard one. The contractor has written to local residents giving them a telephone number to contact if problems arise.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has taken any noise measurements of the repair work on the Thornbridge viaduct of the M6 motorway, Birmingham; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: No noise measurements of the repair work have been carried out so far but our agents will take measurements of noise if considered necessary. The environmental health officer for Birmingham has visited the site but as far as we are aware did not take any noise measurements. He is able to take whatever noise measurements he decides.

Wadebridge Bypass

Mr. Neale: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress made on the design and consultation process leading to the planned construction of the A39 bypass of Wadebridge, north Cornwall; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: We have almost completed the statutory procedures. Subject to a successful outcome it should be possible to invite tenders next spring in accordance with the national trunk road programme published in the roads report earlier this year.

Housing (Heathrow)

Mr. Ground: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many times houses in the vicinity of Heathrow airport have suffered vortex damage from aircraft in respect of which repairs have been carried out or compensation paid under the airport compensation scheme in each year since the scheme was instituted; and how many such houses have suffered from damage once, twice, three times, four times, five times or more than five times.

Mr. McLoughlin: Information on vortex damage should be sought from Heathrow Airport Ltd.

Property Sales

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how the money realised from sales of domestic properties by his Department is treated.

Mr. Freeman: Proceeds from the sale of properties acquired in connection with the construction of motorways and trunk roads are appropriated in aid of class VII, vote 1—national roads, England. Proceeds from the sale of coastguard cottages are appropriated in aid of class VII, vote 2—administration and transport services.

King's Cross-St. Pancras Project

Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the King's Cross-St. Pancras project to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 22 to 26 October 1990.

A629-A650 Airedale Route

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the average daily traffic flows for the A629-A650 Airedale route at (i) Kildwick to Steeton, (ii) Steeton to Beechcliffe, (iii) Hard Ings road, Beechcliffe to Victoria Park and (iv) Victoria Park to Crossflatts.

Mr. Freeman: The 24-hour average daily traffic flows recorded in 1989 on the A629-A650 Airedale route were:

	Vehicles per day
Kildwick to Steeton	18,600
Steeton to Beechcliffe	24,200
Hard Ings Road, Beechcliffe to Victoria Park	23,500
Victoria Park to Crossflatts	16,800

Vehicle Inspectorate

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the vehicle inspectorate executive agency annual report for 1989-90 will be published.

Mr. Chope: The annual report has been published today. Copies are being placed in the House Library.

Rail Freight

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to encourage further private sector involvement in rail freight.

Mr. Freeman: I welcome greater private sector involvement in the railways and have today launched "Charterail", a new rail freight joint venture between British Rail, GKN and City investors. "Charterail" plans to offer customers a total door-to-door distribution operation and is primarily aimed at the fast-moving consumer goods market.

Marchioness (Report)

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he has taken to implement the recommendations of the chief inspector of marine accidents' interim report on the collision between the Marchioness and the Bowbelle.

Mr. Parkinson: Directly after the tragedy I announced immediate requirements for chartered Thames river craft to record passenger numbers before sailing, and lodge the record ashore, and that passengers should be given proper instructions on where to find emergency equipment and what to do in the case of an emergency. Regulations to make these provisions mandatory for all passenger craft throughout the United Kingdom came into force on 12 April 1990.

Within 10 days I had received the marine accident investigation branch's interim report, and announced that the six recommendations made in that report should take effect as soon as practicable, with the assistance of the Port of London Authority where required.

The two recommendations on look-outs and lights on vessels of more than 40m in length were implemented on 18 September 1989 by amendments to the general direction for navigation in the port of London.

The third recommendation related to the need for those in charge of passenger launches to keep continuous radio watch—implemented in the same general directions for navigation—and look frequently astern—covered in a PLA notice to mariners. This recommendation also proposed that if necessary insulation against noise should be provided on passenger launches. My surveyors are taking action to ensure that launches are modified so that recommended noise levels are not exceeded.

The fourth recommendation proposed a review of traffic control arrangements, particularly under bridges. This has been considered, and a contractor has been appointed to develop a triggered light system, activated by the passage of ships along the river, indicating priority for larger vessels at bridges.

The fifth recommendation was that the interim recommendations should be transmitted to port authorities generally. This has been done.

The final recommendation suggested that the Department should examine the possibility of setting standards for the construction of ships' bridges, with a view to international agreement. This recommendation is being dealt with on two fronts. First, the question of bridge visibility has already been raised at the International Maritime Organisation with a view to incorporating the IMO guidelines as an amendment to the safety of life at sea convention 1974. Secondly, inspections of all relevant vessels on the Thames are taking place to determine existing visibility standards in order to determine necessary action. These inspections are well under way.

Apart from this action, I should also add that all passenger craft on the Thames were inspected by my surveyors after the tragedy, and the frequency of random inspections has been increased.

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to be able to make the chief inspector of marine accidents' report into the collision between the Marchioness and Bowbelle publicly available.

Mr. Parkinson: I have received the final report of the chief inspector of marine accidents into the collision between the Marchioness and Bowbelle and have been considering publication in the light of the decision by the Director of Public Prosecutions to prosecute the master of the Bowbelle.

I have been advised by the director that publication of the report would give rise to a serious risk of prejudice to the current criminal proceedings. In these circumstances, the balance of the public interest lies clearly in favour of delaying publication of the full report and I am driven to the conclusion that the report cannot be published until the prosecution is concluded.

However, in the interest of ensuring safety on the River Thames, and generally improving the safety of life at sea, I am anxious that the recommendations of the chief inspector should be made available so that action to avoid such an accident in future can be taken as soon as possible. I am therefore today publishing the chief inspector's recommendations in advance of the full report. The chief inspector is forwarding the recommendations to those persons or bodies who in his opinion are most fitted to implement them. I am placing copies in the Library.

I can assure the House that the chief inspector's report will be published in full as soon as possible after the prosecution is completed.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Freeman: Overall responsibility for helping small businesses rests with the Department of Employment. The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance. The success of their policies is demonstrated by the latest statistics, which show a record increase in the number of businesses registered for VAT of 1,700 a week during 1989. Over the decade the overall increase has been 373,000.

The policies of the Department of Transport are concerned to ensure that transport infrastructure is adequate and to lift the burden on businesses caused by unnecessary regulation so that all businesses can flourish.

Much progress has been made on commitments made in the November 1988 White Paper, "Releasing Enterprise", including the change to the heavy goods vehicle plating and testing threshold that the Secretary of State announced at the time of the Budget statement. This change means more sensible rules for business to comply with and understand in a sector of the vehicle market which is expected to expand, and will bring up to 200,000 light goods vehicles out of the HGV plating and testing scheme and into the less costly MOT scheme. This will be of considerable benefit to small businesses using light goods vehicles.

The Department is also at the forefront of the initiative to create executive agencies. The vehicle inspectorate executive agency was created on 1 August 1988, becoming the very first executive agency in Government. On 2 April 1990, three more executive arms of the DTp attained agency status—the vehicle certification agency, the driving standards agency and the driver and vehicle licensing agency. All the agencies share the common objective of improving customer service while providing good value for money. Individual agencies publicise financial and service quality targets in their annual business plans.

Departmental procurement procedures also encourage the use of small firms. The Department procurement unit encourages small firms to supply the Department—mainly through the pamphlet, "Selling to the Department of Transport" but also by attending "meet the buyer" events. Approximately 1,000 copies of the pamphlet have been issued since the beginning of February.

Cross-city Rail Line, Birmingham

Mrs. Heal: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received any submissions from British Rail for the authorisation of the electrification of the Birmingham cross-city line between Lichfield City and Lichfield Trent Valley.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that an extension of the cross-city electrification scheme to Lichfield Trent Valley is being considered by British Rail. Such an extension would not require ministerial authorisation.

Tankers

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 9 July, Official Report, column 83, if he is now in a position to publish his assessment of the review of tanker traffic in the deep water route west of the Hebrides and the Minch.

Mr. McLoughlin: A survey of tanker traffic using the Minch and the alternative deep water route to the west of the Outer Hebrides was carried out in September and October last year. I am arranging for a copy of the report to be placed in the Library.

Laden tankers over 10,000 grt are recommended to use the deep water route when weather conditions permit. During the 21 days and nights of the survey, 21 tankers passing through the area off the north-west of Scotland could have used the route. Of these, four used the route, four claimed that they were prevented from doing so by bad weather and 13—an average of only two laden tankers every three days—used the Minch route in weather conditions which appeared to allow use of the deep water route.

My Department has sought explanations from shipowners on the use of the Minch route. It is clear from the responses that routes were carefully considered taking account of weather conditions and forecasts at the time of route planning.

My Department will continue to urge shipowners and masters to use the deep water route whenever weather conditions make it practicable. They will do this both directly and indirectly through national flag state administrations, harbour authorities and the International Maritime Organisation. But it will never be possible to eliminate tanker traffic from the more sheltered Minch route, as it is essential that ships' masters retain the freedom to use that route when they judge it to be safest.

National Bus Company

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received to renationalise the former constituent companies of the National Bus Company.

Mr. Freeman: I have received no such representations.

Rent Revenue (Blighted Houses)

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that the rents obtained from tenants in houses purchased by the Government which are blighted by projected road schemes maximise the revenue to the Treasury.

Mr. Freeman: It is the Department's general policy to contract out the management of residential property acquired in advance of trunk road proposals. It is the responsibility of managing agents to find suitable tenants at appropriate rents. My hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic will write to my right hon. Friend about the effect of these arrangements in his constituency.

A27

Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive details of the economic appraisal and cost benefit analysis relating to the possible construction of a temporary roundabout at the A27/B2132 Arisford junction.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 23 July 1990]: Very shortly. We shall let my hon. Friend know the outcome of our consideration of the appraisal.

Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive detailed designs for the proposed equestrian underpass on the A27 at Fontwell; and what prospects he envisages for construction work on this project in the current year.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 23 July 1990]: We expect to receive detailed designs early this autumn. Subject to this, and there being no difficulties in obtaining the necessary land, we would hope to be able to process a scheme for a start of works next spring.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Ombudsman's Reports

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science on how many occasions a local education authority has refused to comply with the principal findings of a report by the Commissioner for Local Administration.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This is a matter for the Commissioner for Local Administration in England who is entirely independent of central and local government. I understand that to date local authorities have refused to comply in a total of 165 cases. Although the commission's records do not permit a breakdown of this total, they have identified three cases in the last two years where local education authorities have failed to comply.

Wandsworth CTCs

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimated effect on central Government receipts and expenditure of the proposed opening of two city technology colleges in the London borough of Wandsworth; and what is the effect on the central Government capital and other allocations for Wandsworth of the proposed reorganisation of secondary schools in Wandsworth.

Mr. MacGregor: I am currently considering a proposal from ADT plc for the establishment of a city technology college in Wandsworth, which has been the subject of consultation with the local authority and others with an interest. Should I decide in favour of the proposal, I would be prepared to fund up to 80 per cent. of the capital costs and to meet all normal running costs thereafter.

I am aware that the London borough of Wandsworth intends to publish a consultation document on its secondary reorganisation proposals, which include the establishment of a voluntary aided school with CTC characteristics. If such a school were to be established, it would be treated as any other voluntary aided school in relation to bids for central Government contributions towards capital expenditure; and, correspondingly, capital bids for county schools would be treated in the normal way.

School Meals

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what were the proportions of pupils receiving free school meals in every year since 1979-80;

(2) what were the proportions of pupils receiving school meals in every year since 1979-80.

Mr. MacGregor: The proportion of pupils receiving school meals and free school meals in maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special schools since 1979 is given in the table. There was no school meals census in 1985.

	Proportion of pupils receiving a school meal	Proportion of pupils receiving a free school meal
1979	64	12
1980	48	10
1981	49	11
1982	49	14
1983	51	16
1984	51	17
1986	49	18
1987	50	18
1988	47	12
1989	43	11

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what would be the gross and net costs of restoring the right to free school meals to those children who lost that right through the Social Security Act 1986.

Mr. Alan Howarth: It is not possible to estimate the cost of reintroducing the wide variety of discretionary schemes which existed prior to the implementation of the Social Security Act 1986.

Class Sizes

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the numbers and proportions of pupils in special schools in classes over 10.

Mr. MacGregor: Information on the numbers and proportions of pupils in special schools in classes over 10 is not available centrally.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance. The success of their policies is demonstrated by the latest statistics which show a record increase in the number of small businesses registered for VAT, of 1,700 a week during 1989. Over the decade the overall increase has been 373,000.

It was estimated that during 1989-90 the Department purchased goods to the value of £11·5 million—£6·1 million the previous year—of which some £4·2 million benefited small firms—£2·4 million the previous year.

Approximately 40 per cent. of our services—minor works, cleaning, transportation, and so on—continues to be provided by small firms.

Performance indicators and a computerised procurement monitoring system are currently being developed. Meantime this Department continues to operate a policy of including small firms on tender lists whenever an appropriate opportunity arises.

Student Awards

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students in each England and Wales local authority area received (a) mandatory awards and (b) discretionary awards in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: The data required are listed in the table.

Student Loans

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will specify the powers under which he proposes to authorise expenditure on access funds in relation to the student loans scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: Payments of the access funds to the funding councils will be made under the powers available in sections 131(4) and 132(4) of the Education Reform Act 1988. Payments of the access funds to local education authority colleges of further education and to institutions directly grant-aided by the Department will be made under new regulations, to be laid before the House this week, made under the powers in section 100(1)(b) and (3) of the Education Act 1944. The regulations will enable the Secretary of State to make payments of the access funds to such institutions; they will not prescribe how the funds should be disbursed by these institutions to their students.

University Pay

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to announce his decision on the university lecturers' salary negotiations; and if he will make a statement on the time taken to reach this decision.

Mr. MacGregor: My Department has today notified the chairman of committee A of the Universities Academic Salaries Committees that we accept the pay increases recommended for non-clinical academic staff in the committee's 25th report. My Department has also written to the chief executive of the Universities Funding Council to authorise the release of the £20 million held back against the conclusion of a satisfactory pay settlement. I had to consider the 25th report carefully against the criterion which we set for the release of the £20 million—greater flexibility and differentiation in the salary structure. I have made it clear that I shall be looking for greater expansion of the flexibility element within the pay structure in next year's settlement for non-clinical academic staff.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Esprit Buildings, Brussels

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the amount of British equipment which was supplied for the new Esprit building in Brussels.

Mr. Sainsbury: My Department has no information on this matter, which is one for the European Commission in view of its responsibility for equipping the new Bredel building in Brussels, occupied by Esprit together with many other Commission staff.

Textiles and Clothing

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with Ministers from other European Community countries on the need for barriers to Community exports of textiles and clothing to be reduced, and for subsidies to be ended.

Mr. Sainsbury: There are regular discussions between EC Ministers, both bilaterally and in the Council, on the current Uruguay round of GATT multilateral trade negotiations, in which one of the Community's main objectives is to secure greater market opening and effective rules on subsidies.

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met representatives from the Apparel, Knitting and Textiles Alliance; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend's predecessor met representatives of the Apparel, Knitting and Textiles Alliance on 12 June to discuss progress in the GATT Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations.

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in negotiations for strengthening general agreement on tariffs and trade rules and disciplines applying to international trade in textiles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The trade negotiations committee is meeting this week in Geneva to take stock of progress in all 15 Uruguay round negotiating groups on the basis of reports from the groups' chairmen. The aim of the meeting will be to narrow differences of view as far as possible and to identify areas where further work is needed. The EC's position—supported by the United Kingdom—is that trade in textiles should be integrated into GATT on the basis of strengthened rules and disciplines.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made in the GATT negotiations on the future framework for world trade in textiles and clothing.

Mr. Sainsbury: The chairman of the GATT negotiating group on textiles and clothing has produced a chairman's report for consideration by the trade negotiations committee in Geneva this week. This is designed to take into account various negotiating positions and, therefore, contains a significant number of alternative options. Many of these differences of view are unlikely to be resolved until nearer the end of the negotiations in December, but the European Community continues to press for a progressive phase out of the MFA over a transitional period and on the basis of strengthened GATT rules and disciplines.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations have been made to his Department by the textiles and clothing industries regarding the GATT rules (a) governing subsidies, (b) governing dumping, (c) controlling theft of designs and brand names and (d) on safeguards.

Mr. Sainsbury: The GATT rules mentioned by the hon. Member are the subject of regular representations to Ministers in my Department, particularly in the context of the current multilateral trade negotiations.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the level of imports of textiles and clothing in the first four months of 1990, and for the same four months in 1989.

Mr. Sainsbury: The value of imports was £2,662 million in the first four months of 1990, compared with £2,411 million in the same four months of 1989.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations have been made to his Department by the textiles and clothing industries about the trade barriers faced by United Kingdom exporters to countries outside the European Community.

Mr. Sainsbury: Ministers in the Department frequently receive representations from the textile industry about foreign barriers to United Kingdom exports, both directly and through hon. Members. It is one of the European Community's main aims in the Uruguay round to achieve a reduction by all parties in their tariff and non-tariff barriers.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the level of United Kingdom textiles and clothing (a) imports from and (b) exports to Turkey in the first four months of 1990.

Mr. Sainsbury: The figures are:
(a) £80 million.
(b) £7 million.

Unpublished Departmental Reports

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central of 16 July, Official Report, column 383, he will now list the number of unpublished reports prepared by his Department under the Insurance Companies Acts in each year since 1980.

Mr. Redwood: The table sets out the number of completed investigations under section 44(2)(b) of the Insurance Companies Act 1982 since 1980.

1980	0
1981	1
1982	0

Companies House

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what increases there have been in the charge for postal sales of the microfiche records of companies from Companies House since December 1983; what has been the average annual increase; what has been the basis on which the charge has been set; and what effect changes in the efficiency of the Companies House agency have had on the charges.

Mr. Redwood: The price of obtaining a company search by post was set at £2 when the service was introduced in December 1983. It was subsequently increased to £4 in July 1988 and to £5 in July 1990, which is equivalent to an average annual increase of 15 per cent. The policy is now that the price of this service should cover its costs, taking one year with another, although in the past it has not done so. The increases would have been much higher without the productivity gains achieved by Companies House over this period.

Tradeable Information Guidelines

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many persons are awaiting copies of the tradeable information guidelines, based on the European Communities synergy guidelines; and when he intends to send the Department's guidelines to those who have requested them.

Mr. Redwood: The Department of Trade and Industry published tradeable information guidelines in September 1986. This served in part as the basis for the European Commission publication "Guidelines for improving the synergy between the public and private sectors in the information market". A revised edition of the United Kingdom guide has been published by my Department this month, entitled "Government-held tradeable information. Guidelines for government departments in dealing with the private sector". This is now being distributed to Government Departments and others who have expressed interest.

Company Information

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what United Kingdom legislation provides for the public right to postal sales of company information from the Registrar of Companies on the price basis required by EEC directive 68/151 article 3, paragraph 3.

Mr. Redwood: Section 709 of the Companies Act 1985 provides a statutory right to certified copies of company documents. When this section is amended by section 126(2) of the Companies Act 1989, there will additionally be a statutory right to uncertified copies. There are no express provisions in the Companies Act on the price basis for providing these services or the method of delivery.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what legislative provision he intends to introduce in respect of charges for the postal sales service for company information on microfiche and other forms.

Mr. Redwood: The statutory fees for certified copies of documents are prescribed by the Companies (Fees) Regulations 1988. When section 126(2) of the Companies Act 1989 is brought into force, the regulations will be amended to prescribe a statutory fee for uncertified copies, which will cover the postal search service.

Telecommunications

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how he plans to review the commitment given by the Government in November 1983 that they did not intend to license operators other than British Telecommunications and Mercury Communications to provide basic fixed-link telecommunications for a period of seven years.

Mr. Lilley: We will publish a consultative document in the autumn setting out the issues to be reviewed and indicating where appropriate the Government's preferred options. The review will be wide-ranging and will be conducted in close association with the Director General of Telecommunications. It will cover local and trunk telephone services, cable entertainment services and international telecommunications. There will be a period for public comment, after which the Government will aim to announce their decisions early in the new year.

ECGD

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the number of policyholders with the Export Credits Guarantee Department with an annual export turnover of under (a) £1 million and (b) £500,000 in each of the years 1985 to 1989.

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the number of policyholders with the Export Credits Guarantee Department with an annual export turnover of under £1 million for each of the years 1985 to 1989.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 19 July 1990]: The ECGD insures contracts with buyers in specified countries and does not necessarily require policyholders to inform the ECGD of their annual export turnovers. In addition, some companies insure their business with ECGD through an intermediary rather than direct with the ECGD. Accordingly information is not held in the form required to answer the question. In the financial year 1989-90 a total of 4,720 policyholders each declared business of less than £1 million. This was not necessarily their total export turnover. These figures refer only to the Cardiff-based insurance services short-term business and not to project business.

Ford Plant (Hungary)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact upon British industry of the locating of Ford's proposed automotive components plant in Hungary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 19 July 1990]: The siting of investment is a commercial matter for the company. Many overseas companies, particularly in the car and automotive components sectors, including Ford, have invested in the United Kingdom, attracted by the favourable climate for business created by the Government.

EC Structual Funds

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of European Community structural funds devoted to correcting regional imbalance was devoted to projects within the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The United Kingdom's share of the European regional development fund over the last five years is shown in column C:

ERDF commitments

£ million

	(A) Total EC	(B) Total United Kingdom	(C) United Kingdom share Per cent.
1985	1,469	358	24·4
1986	2,227	368	16·5
1987	2,581	449	17·4
1988	2,543	387	15·2
1989	3,020	343	11·4

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) to what extent Government policy is compatible with that of the Community in regard to the expansion and use of structural funds within the United Kingdom; and what plans he has to achieve full compatibility after 1992;

(2) what action he is taking to ensure that the United Kingdom secures a fair and justifiable share of European structural funds up to and beyond 1992.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 23 July 1990]: Government policy is already compatible with that of the Community with regard to the structural funds, which involve a partnership between national Governments, the Commission and others. The Community support frameworks, which detail the amounts of funding, are agreed between the Government and the Commission.

The Government will continue to make every effort in their contacts with the Commission to ensure that the United Kingdom obtains its fair share of the structural funds up to and beyond 1992.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the number of projects and the value of the financial support from European structural funds devoted to each region of the United Kingdom in each of the last five years; and what is the number which he expects to be supported in each region in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The number of projects receiving structural fund assistance and the value of European social fund and EAGGF guidance fund commitments by region are not readily available. A regional breakdown of European regional development fund commitments over the last five years is in the table.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what funding has been received from European Community structural funds in the Yorkshire and Humberside steel area programme in each year since 1988; and what funding is expected in 1990-91 and 1991-92 in this area.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 23 July 1990]: Commitments from the European regional development fund and the European social fund to the Yorkshire and Humberside steel area programme were £7·1 million in the calendar year 1988 and £20·8 million in 1989. Commitments for 1990, 1991 and 1992 are expected to be £28·9 million, £37·3 million and £31·4 million respectively. Commitments by financial year are not readily available.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the sum available from the structural funds of the European Community between 1987 and 1990; and what proportion of that sum was devoted to South Yorkshire.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 23 July 1990]: In the period 1987 to 1990 commitments from the European regional development fund, European social fund, and the EAGGF guidance fund for the whole of the European Community are estimated at £12 billion, £9·6 billion and £3·6 billion respectively, giving a total of £25·2 billion for all three structural funds. Figures for ESF and EAGGF guidance commitments for South Yorkshire are not readily available. ERDF commitments for South Yorkshire in the period 1987 to 1990 are estimated at £59·1 million, some 0·5 per cent. of total EC and ERDF commitments.

Financial Services

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how often those offences under the Financial Services Act concerning (i) inducing another person to enter an investment by knowingly making a false or misleading statement, (ii) knowingly engaging in any act or course of conduct which creates a false or misleading impression of the market and (iii) inducing another person to enter an insurance contract by knowingly making false or misleading statements have been used.

Mr. John Patten: I have been asked to reply.

Records available to my Department show that no persons had been prosecuted under the Financial Services Act 1986 up to the end of 1988.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Vietnamese Boat People

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement regarding overcrowding in the detention centres for Vietnamese boat people in Hong Kong.

Mr. Waldegrave: The 10 detention centres in Hong Kong have a combined design capacity of 45,000 places. Their current population is 44,200. A new purpose-built detention centre at Tai a Chau will be completed later this year, making available an additional 10,000 places. This will enable the Hong Kong Government to close some of the smaller existing centres, further reduce the populations in the main detention centres, and make more accommodation available to UNHCR and the voluntary agencies to enable them to expand their programme of services.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement regarding the treatment of communicable diseases in the detention centres for Vietnamese boat people in Hong Kong.

Mr. Waldegrave: The majority of patients suffering from communicable diseases are admitted to the infectious disease unit of the Princess Margaret hospital. In 1988 there were 1,491 cases, the majority of which were chicken pox. In 1989 there were 2,583 cases, 20 per cent. of the total number of notifiable diseases reported in Hong Kong. This increase is explained by the arrival of over 34,000 boat people in Hong Kong during that year. Of these cases, 1,271 were chicken pox, 149 dysentery, 685 malaria, 83 measles, 226 tuberculosis, 120 viral hepatitis and 23 cholera.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement regarding current living conditions in each of the detention centres for Vietnamese boat people in Hong Kong.

Mr. Waldegrave: Living conditions in the detention centres have steadily improved as new purpose-built accommodation has become available.

Considerable progress has been made in expanding the voluntary agency programmes which cover education, medical care, family planning and excursions for children.

Water supplies are more than adequate, per capita consumption being well above the average for Hong Kong. Food is prepared in central kitchens in each centre by Vietnamese workers, using dietary scales drawn up in conjunction with the UNHCR. Sanitary conditions are satisfactory and have improved with the reduction in overcrowding and as boat people become more familiar with the facilities.

Visas

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list, for each of the last 12 months for which figures are available, the numbers of (a) applications received for visas for visits to the United Kingdom, and (b) such visas granted at the embassy of Her Majesty's Government in Moscow.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Information is available as follows:

	Visa applications received	Visas issued
1989	27,918	27,838
[1]1990	15,643	15,612

[1] January to May.

European Community Directives

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has received to his letter to the President of the European Commission proposing regular six-monthly reviews of national compliance with EEC directives; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: In his reply of 15 June, M. Delors agreed that the Community should redouble efforts to ensure full and correct national implementation of European Community decisions, and referred to Commission consideration of new ways of presenting reports on implementation of Community law.

At its Dublin meeting the European Council asked the Commission to strengthen its supervisory procedures and agreed to review the matter in December.

Ilois People

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are his responsibilities in relation to the Ilois people from the British Indian Ocean Territories who are currently in Mauritius.

Mr. Waldegrave: None. All are Mauritian citizens, although some may also be British dependent territories citizens.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Agriculture Specialists

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 8 March, Official Report, columns 787-88, concerning the number of Overseas Development Administration agricultural specialists who are women, whether there have been any changes in the figures since that date.

Mrs. Chalker: The number of the ODA's own specialists overseas remains at eight, none of whom are women. We still have one woman natural resources adviser on secondment to a technical co-operation assignment in Bangladesh.

Rihand Power Station

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 19 July, when an appraisal of the Rihand power station project will begin; when it will be completed; and who is carrying out the assessment.

Mrs. Chalker: The appraisal of the power station will be taken forward in a series of studies: an initial assessment of issues was conducted in October 1989; if a contract is awarded to a British contractor and British aid funding is requested, a further appraisal will be carried out to assess the economic, financial and engineering aspects of the proposed contract and, in the light of the World bank's study of the Singrauli area, of the environmental aspects of the project. As the contract has yet to be awarded, it is not possible to say when these further studies will be completed. The appraisal studies will be led by staff from the Overseas Development Administration and may call on expertise from outside the administration.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 3 July, Official Report, column 489, what is the value of the provisional offer of aid for the second stage of Rihand power station; what is the total value of the contract for the second stage; which British company has been nominated as the main contractor; and what is the exact megawattage of the second phase.

Mrs. Chalker: No commitment has been given to a specific amount of aid. Before making any such commitment, the Overseas Development Administration will need to be satisfied that the proposed contract price and the project as a whole represent a cost-effective and environmentally sound approach to power generation in India. Following international tendering, discussions are in progress between the client, the National Thermal Power Corporation, and contractors, and the value of any contract has therefore yet to be determined. GEC was nominated as the main British contractor in 1987. The proposed second phase of the power station will be for 1,000 MW.

Contracts (Value-for-money Inquiries)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to ensure that no contractual relationship exists between Messrs Biwaters and any firms of consultants Her Majesty's Government have employed on value-for-money inquiries, checks or audits on contracts assisted by the Overseas Development Administration.

Mrs. Chalker [pursuant to her reply, 18 July 1990, c. 600]: Not only were there no contractual relationships between Biwater and either the firms or the individual specialist carrying out the value-for-money checks at the time the checks were commissioned, as I have already informed the hon. Gentleman, but there were no such relationships at any time during the execution of the checks.

PRIME MINISTER

EC Intergovernmental Conference

Q49. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Prime Minister is she will make a statement on the progress of ministerial interdepartmental co-ordination in preparation for the European Community intergovernmental conference meetings in December.

The Prime Minister: Interdepartmental preparations for both intergovernmental conferences continue in the usual way.

Community Care

Q173. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Prime Minister what representations she has received on community care aspects of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

The Prime Minister: I receive many representations in correspondence, and Health Ministers receive further representations at regular meetings with organisations about our plans for community care.

Court Proceedings (Children's Evidence)

Q190. Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government have any proposals to introduce changes to the rules governing the giving of evidence by children in court proceedings involving allegations of physical abuse or sexual abuse; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 19 July at column 674.

ECGD

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister, further to her reply of 19 July, when the review of Export Credits Guarantee Department medium-term credit will be completed; who is undertaking it; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The availability of Export Credits Guarantee Department medium-term cover is kept under close and continuing review. The reviews are undertaken by ECGD and then in consultation with all the interested Government Departments.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 July.

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 July.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 July.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 July.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Correspondence

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Prime Minister what progress has so far been made by the Cabinet Office efficiency unit inquiry into departmental handling of hon. Members' correspondence with Ministers; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The scrutiny is now under way. The scrutiny team rightly attaches great importance to seeking Members' views and sent a questionnaire to all hon. Members and is arranging to see a number of Members to discuss their views on this subject. The team is expected to produce its report by the end of November.

Security Vetting

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will make a statement about the procedures for security vetting within the Government.

The Prime Minister: The security vetting system continues to form a key part of the protective arrangements for safeguarding national security and countering terrorism. The system that has been used to investigate the reliability of those who are expected to have regular access to highly classified information is known as positive vetting (PV); it has now been in operation for nearly 40 years. A more rigorous form of PV—known as enhanced positive vetting (EPV)—has been applied to all employees of the security and intelligence agencies and to a small number of people on closely associated work in other Government Departments since the implementation of the recommendations of the Security Commission in its report on the Prime case published in 1983—Cmnd. 8876. In addition, it has been the long-standing practice of successive Governments to carry out a more limited range of background checks, including criminal record checks, for access to less sensitive information and, increasingly, for the purposes of countering terrorism: this system has been known within the Government as normal vetting (NV).

As indicated in the Government's response, published today, to the Home Affairs Select Committee report on criminal records which commented on the use of criminal record checks for the purpose of security vetting, the Government have decided, following a comprehensive review, that the security vetting system should be restructured and operated on the basis of defined and published criteria. From 1 October 1990 all candidates for security vetting will be asked to complete a security questionaire which will explain the purpose of the procedure and invite them to provide the personal details required for the necessary checks to be carried out. Vetting will then be carried out on the basis of the following revised statement of policy.

The aim is to ensure that checks are carried out only to the extent necessary to safeguard national security and for the purposes of countering terrorism in the light of the current assessment of the threats to security. The changes will not affect the position of any individuals who have been vetted under the current arrangements.

When the reliability of a public servant is thought to be in doubt on security grounds, there is a right of appeal to the three advisers—the tribunal appointed by the Government to advise Ministers in such cases—where security considerations are involved and to the permanent head of the Department in cases involving aspects of conduct and character alone. These arrangements will remain in force. Copies of a statement of the existing procedure, which will be amended as necessary to reflect the following policy, and the current terms of reference of the three advisers are available in the Library of the House.

Statement of Vetting Policy: with effect from 1 October 1990.

In the interests of national security and of safeguarding Parliamentary democracy, it is the policy of HMG that no one should be employed in connection with work the nature of which is vital to the security of the state who:

(a) is, or has been, involved in, or associated with any of the following activities threatening national security:
  (i) espionage,
  (ii) terrorism,
  (iii) sabotage,
  (iv) actions intended to overthrow or undermine Parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means; or

(b) is, or has recently been, a member of any organisation which has advocated such activities; or

(c) is, or has recently been, associated with any such organisation, or any of its members, in such a way as to raise reasonable doubts about his or her reliability; or

(d) is susceptible to pressure from any such organisation or from a foreign intelligence service or a hostile power; or

(e) suffers from defects of character which may expose him or her to blackmail or other influence by any such organisation or by a foreign intelligence service or which may otherwise indicate unreliability.

2. In accordance with that policy Government Departments will in future submit all candidates for posts involving access to highly classified information to one of the following levels of vetting clearance, depending on the circumstances:

(a) PV(S): this level of clearance is required before regular access to SECRET information can be authorised. In some circumstances, where it would not be possible for an individual to make reasonable progress in their career without clearance to SECRET level, it may be applied to candidates for employment whose duties may not, initially, involve regular access to SECRET information. A PV(S) clearance will normally consist of a full record check, that is a check against any relevant Departmental personnel records, a check against the National Collection of Criminal Records, and other necessary security checks, including a check against the records of the Security Service and police forces. In some cases further enquiries, including an interview with the subject, may be carried out.

(b) PV(TS): this level of clearance is required before regular and constant access to TOP SECRET information can be authorised and for certain other posts involving access to highly sensitive classified information or material. It may also be applied in the following circumstances:
  (i) at the discretion of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office before employment overseas in posts connected with British diplomatic or consular missions:
  (ii) at the discretion of Home Office, the Northern Ireland Office and the Scottish Office, in a post in the police service involving regular and constant access to SECRET information held or generated by a Special Branch which relates to espionage, sabotage or terrorism, or to actions intended to overthrow or undermine Parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means;
  (iii) at departmental discretion before employment in a departmental security post;
  (iv) at the discretion of the security and intelligence agencies to members of their ancillary staff.

A PV(TS) clearance will consist of a record check on similar lines to that carried out for PV(S) clearances, supplemented by a formal check on the credit worthiness of the individual and by interviews with the subject and persons familiar with their character in both the home and the work environment.

(c) EPV: this is the most rigorous form of PV clearance now applied to members of the security and intelligence agencies and to a small number of staff employed on closely associated work in Government Departments. It consists of the same sort of enquiries as those made for a PV(TS) background investigation, but to a greater depth.

3. In addition security checks may also be carried out in the following circumstances:

(a) for the protection of classified information. Basic security checks, known as Reliability Checks, may be carried out in the interestes of national security before:

(i) individuals are granted unescorted access to premises or areas where highly classified information or material is held and where there is a risk of accidental access to that information or material; and

(ii) individuals are authorised to have access to certain categories of information classified CONFIDENTIAL, mostly in the fields of defence and foreign affairs.

The aim of such checks is primarily to ensure that the character of the individual concerned is such that they can be trusted in circumstances where they may gain access to information of importance to national security

(b) for the protection of public figures and military and civil establishments at particular risk of attack by terrorist organisations. Irrespective of the degree of access to classified information security checks, known as Counter Terrorist Checks, may be carried out in the interest of national security before:

(i) individuals take up posts which involve proximity to public figures at particular risk of attack by terrorist organisations, or which give access to information or material assessed to be of value to terrorists;

(ii) individuals are granted unescorted access to certain military and civil establishments assessed to be at particular risk of attack by terrorist organisations.

The aim of such checks is to prevent individuals who have connections with terrorist organisations, or who may be vulnerable to pressure from such organisations, from gaining access to certain posts and, in some circumstances, premises where there is a risk that they could exploit that position to further the aims of a terrorist organisation.

4. A check against the National Collection of Criminal Records is an invariable feature of a Reliability Check clearance; and criminal record information may also be taken into account in a Counter Terrorist Check clearance. Other security checks may be carried out as necessary.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Firearms

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many requests for (a) renewals and (b) variations of firearms certificates have been refused in each of the Royal Ulster Constabulary divisions in Belfast in each of the last three years for which figures are available;

(2) how many applications for a firearms certificate for (a) shotguns, (b) rifles, (c) handguns and (d) other firearms have been refused in each Royal Ulster Constabulary division in Belfast in each of the last three years for which figures are available, or as much of such information as is available to him;

(3) if he will publish a table to show by reference to Royal Ulster Constabulary division how many firearms certificates have been withdrawn in each of the last three years; and if he will specify, by type and number of firearms, the firearms to which such certificates related and indicate how many of the certificates were withdrawn because the holder had been convicted of (a) terrorist activity and (b) other illegal actions for which he was sentenced in a court of law, or as much of such information as is available to him.

Mr. Cope: The Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary has informed me that the information is not held in a manner which makes the statistics asked for readily available and they could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) shotguns, (b) rifles, (c) handguns and (d) other firearms have been stolen from the legal owners in each Royal Ulster Constabulary division in Belfast in each of the last three years for which figures are available, or as much of such information as is available to him.

Mr. Cope: The Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary has informed me that the information is not recorded in the format sought. The following information is available however for the past two years:

	Bullet firing weapons	Shotguns	Other weapons (including air weapons)
A Division
1988	1	2	1
1989	6	2	0
B Division
1988	2	2	1
1989	4	0	0
D Division
1988	8	16	2
1989	2	2	1
E Division
1988	2	4	0
1989	4	3	1

Education Board Tribunals

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what date did each of the appeals tribunals of the five education area boards commence their work in connection with the new transfer procedure; how many appeals have been received in each of the five education areas; and when he expects all appeal hearings to be completed.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows:

Education area board	Date appeals tribunals commenced work	Number of appeals received
Belfast	19 July 1990	105
Western	16 July 1990	121
North-Eastern	16 July 1990	116
South-Eastern	Expected to be 26 July 1990	91
Southern	Expected to be 7 August 1990	77

I expect appeal hearings to be completed by the end of August.

Grammar Schools

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many grade 2 pupils were refused places in grammar schools; and how many grade 3 and 4 pupils, including those already attending the preparatory departments of grammar schools, were accepted into grammar schools arising from the new transfer procedure this year.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information in the form requested is not readily available. In this year's transfer procedure tests 2,789 pupils were awarded grade 2 of whom 1,872 have been admitted to grammar schools. In addition 399 pupils awarded grade 3 and 80 pupils awarded grade 4 have been admitted to grammar schools.

Teachers

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the funding formula for individual schools in Northern Ireland under local management of schools will make provision for the real cost of teachers' salaries rather than the average salary of a teacher in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: Under the formula the determination of budgets for schools will be based principally on age-weighted pupil numbers. For schools with fewer than 12 teaching staff, the formula may include a factor to provide some protection if the teachers' salaries are higher than average. For all schools, additional teachers' salary costs associated with school reorganisation will be funded outside the formula.

Human Rights

Mr. Ashby: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has received the 15th report of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The report has been published today, and copies have been laid before Parliament. It covers the period 1 April 1989 to 31 March 1990.

The report covers a wide range of matters which the commission has considered during the period under review. These include discrimination and equality of opportunity including fair employment, education, the law relating to children, police and criminal evidence matters, prisons, emergency legislation, the Broadcasting Bill and electoral law.

I attach importance to the work of the commission and value the advice it gives me on a range of human rights issues. I am particularly grateful to the commission for having maintained a programme of work in addition to its recent review of the adequacy and effectiveness of existing laws and institutions to secure freedom from discrimination and further equality of opportunity in Northern Ireland. I laid the second report of that review before Parliament on 26 June—Cm.1107.

Copies of my response to the commission's 15th report and of the report itself have been placed in the Library.

Airports

Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the Government plan to privatise Northern Ireland Airports Ltd.

Mr. Brooke: The Government have decided that Northern Ireland Airports Ltd. is a candidate for privatisation. We shall seek specialist advice.

Terrorist Offences

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were charged with terrorist-type offences following initial detention under Acts other than the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Acts in 1989.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 4 July 1990]: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Terrorism

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons known or claiming to be members of the Irish Republican Army have been killed and injured each year since 1969 as a result of terrorist activities.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 19 July 1990]: The information is not available.

WALES

Disabled People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has laid before Parliament under section 11 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: A report will be laid before Parliament within the required period of one year from 18 December 1989, the date of implementation of section 11 of the Act.

NHS Reform

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether any of the district health authorities in Wales have indicated to his Department an interest on opting out of the present national health service structure in their entirety; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Pembrokeshire health authority has expressed an interest in self-governing status. If the authority submitted a successful application for such status, this would not involve opting out of the NHS structure. Self-governing trusts will remain firmly part of the NHS.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the number of patients requiring non-urgent treatment as in-patients for traumatic and orthopaedic surgery at Withybush hospital at the latest available date who had waited for (a) up to three months, (b) between three months and six months, (c) between six months and nine months, (d) between nine months and one year, (e) between one year and 15 months, (f) between 15 months and 18 months, (g) between 18 months and two years and (h) more than two years;

(2) what was the number of patients requiring treatment as out-patients for traumatic and orthopaedic surgery at the latest available date who had waited for (a)

up to three months, (b) between three months and six months, (c) between six months and nine months, (d) between nine months and one year and (e) more than one year at (i) Nevill Hall hospital, (ii) University Hospital of Wales and (iii) Morriston hospital;

(3) what was the number of patients requiring urgent treatment as in-patients for general surgery including urology at the latest available date, who had waited for (i) between one month and two months, (ii) between two months and three months, (iii) between three months and four months, (iv) between four months and five months, (v) between five months and six months, (vi) between six months and one year and (vii) more than one year at (a) Withybush hospital, (b) St. Woolos hospital and (c) University Hospital of Wales;

(4) what was the number of patients requiring non-urgent treatment as in-patients for general surgery including urology at the latest available date, who had waited for (i) between three months and six months, (ii) between six months and nine months, (iii) between nine months and one year, (iv) between one year and 15 months, (v) between 15 months and 18 months, (vi) between 18 months and 21 months and (vii) between 21 months and two years at (a) Withybush, (b) Nevill Hall, (c) Princess of Wales, (d) Prince Charles, (e) University Hospital of Wales, (f) Cardiff royal infirmary and (g) Neath hospitals;

(5) what was the number of patients requiring treatment as out-patients for general surgery including urology at Morriston hospital, at the latest available date who had waited for (a) between one month and two months, (b) between two months and three months, (c) between three months and six months, (d) between six months and nine months, (e) between nine months and one year and (f) longer than one year;

(6) what was the number of patients requiring urgent treatment as in-patients for traumatic and orthopaedic surgery at Withybush hospital at the latest available date who had waited for (a) less than one month, (b) between one month and two months, (c) between two and three months, (d) between three and four months, (e) between four and five months, (f) between five and six months, (g) between six and seven months, (h) between seven and eight months, (i) between eight and nine months, (j) between nine months and one year and (k) more than one year;

(7) what was the number of patients requiring non-urgent treatment as in-patients for ophthalmology for the latest available date at Singleton and St. Woolos hospitals who had waited for (a) between six and nine months, (b) between nine and 12 months, (c) between 12 and 15 months, (d) between 15 and 18 months, (e) between 18 months and two years and (f) over two years;

(8) what was the number of out-patients requiring ophthalmology treatment at the latest available date at the University Hospital of Wales who had waited for (a) between three and six months, (b) between six and nine months, (c) between nine months and one year and (d) longer than one year;

(9) what was the number of out-patients requiring gynaecology treatment at the latest available date at Prince Charles and Morriston hospitals who had waited for (a) up to three months, (b) three to six months, (c) six to nine months, (d) nine months to one year and (e) longer than one year.

Mr. Grist: Information for the ranges of waiting times specified is not collected centrally in the detail required. The latest information available is published in the "Welsh Hospital Waiting List Bulletin 1990: No. 1" and refers to 30 September 1989; a copy is in the Library of the House.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance. In Wales the latest available figures show that in 1989 the total number of businesses registered for VAT was 85,200; an increase of 21 per cent. on 1980. The Department's specific policies to encourage enterprise in Wales are:

Support for Local Enterprise Agencies

There are currently 23 Local Enterprise Agencies in Wales. Three more organisations have in the year to June 1990 applied to become approved Local Enterprise Agencies and are at present being considered for approval.

Training and Enterprise Councils (TECs)

TECs will take over responsibility for delivering the Small Firms Counselling Service from 1 April 1991. The advent of TECs allows an added dimension of local employer-led flexibilities to be built into these services and TECs will be able to integrate these into their other enterprise programmes. The Mid Glamorgan and West Wales TECs commenced operations on 23 July; the five remaining TECs will come on line early in 1991.

Regional Selective Assistance, Regional Enterprise Grant

Small businesses continue to take advantage of the help available under Regional Selective Assistance. In the year to the end of June 1990, 145 small firms (employing less than 200 people) accepted offers of RSA totalling just over £11·4 million. These results are almost identical to the previous year. A further 289 small firms (employing less than 25 people) accepted offers of Regional Enterprise Grant totalling £2·52 million. This compares with 261 small firms accepting offers of £2·18 million in the previous 12 months.

Enterprise Wales

Launched in January 1988, the Consultancy Initiatives have proved extremely popular in Wales. More than 2,800 companies have applied. In 1989-90 alone, 1,174 Business Reviews were carried out, 27 per cent. above economic weight, and 885 projects were commissioned, 19 per cent. above economic weight.

WDA Advisory Services—Small business inquiries

During 1989-90, a total of 13,000 sessions of advisory visits and interviews have been conducted by the WDA's Business Development staff. Small Firms counsellors undertook over 10,000 first time visits to clients during the same period.

Residential Care

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set out the statutory and other requirements which ensure that changes in the ownership and/or management of private establishments for mentally handicapped people are notified to the authorities.

Mr. Grist: Under sections 2 and 23 of the Registered Homes Act 1984 it is an offence for any person whether owner or manager to carry on a residential care, nursing or mental nursing home without being registered.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what powers to check on the suitability of (a) the proprietor, (b) the manager and (c) anyone with a position of responsibility in respect of a private establishment for mentally handicapped people are currently held by a social services department and by any other authority.

Mr. Grist: Under the Registered Homes Act 1984, registering authorities can refuse registration of a residential care, nursing or mental nursing home if any person concerned or intended to be concerned in carrying on the home is considered not a fit person. In assessing fitness, authorities are advised to investigate whether the applicant for registration or others concerned with the home have previously committed offences under the Registered Homes Act 1984 or received criminal convictions.

Teacher-pupil Ratios

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give each county's average teacher-pupil ratio for general certificate of secondary education classes in (a) mathematics, (b) English, (c) modern European language and (d) Welsh.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Teacher-pupil ratios by individual subject are not available, however information relating to the average size of GCSE classes in year five is as follows. In order to give an accurate figure for GCSE in a modern European language, information for French and German has been given separately.

Average class size in year five GCSE classes, Wales

Prescribing

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will (a) list and (b) place in the Library a copy of any guidelines or advice his Department has offered to family practitioner committees in Wales in respect of the responsibility assumed by them in April for giving advice to general practitioners on prescribing.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to a Welsh health circular No. WHC(89)68/WHC(FP)(89)22, entitled "Managing the General Medical Services". A copy has been placed in the Library.

Health Authority Loans

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the loan of £500,000 by South Glamorgan health authority to Gwynedd health authority in the financial year 1990-91.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 23 July 1990.

BP Chemicals, Port Talbot

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he is taking about flaring and noise from BP Chemicals, Port Talbot.

Mr. Grist: I refer the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the reply given on 20 July at columns 758-59.

SOCIAL SECURITY

International Peto Institute

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, further to the reply of 15 December 1989, Official Report, column 848, how much money has so far been contributed to the International Peto Institute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: In my reply of 15 December at column 845, I indicated that the Government proposed to commit £5 million from Government funds over four years towards the capital costs of the International Peto Institute subject to conclusion of a satisfactory agreement covering access for children and trainee conductors, and to satisfactory progress with construction. I also indicated that we proposed to stimulate interest in the private and voluntary sectors with a view to raising a similar amount from those sources.

Discussions are continuing on these issues and I hope to make a further statement in the near future.

Labour Statistics

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people the Government estimate (a) are not in full-time work, (b) are not in part-time work and (c) are in part-time but would prefer to be in full-time work, because they remain at home to care for elderly, sick or disabled relatives; and what is the average amount of time they remain out of the labour force.

Mr. Scott: There is no information on which to base such estimates.

Social Fund

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish his annual report on the social fund; and when he will publish the social fund commissioner's annual report.

Mr. Newton: My report has been published today and I have laid it before Parliament. I have also placed copies both of my report and of the social fund commissioner's report in the Library. The social fund commissioner's report is expected to be published tomorrow.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance. The success of their policies is demonstrated by the latest statistics which show a record increase in the number of businesses registered for VAT, of 1,700 a week during 1989. Over the decade the overall increase has been 373,000. Specific measures which have been introduced by the Department include:

(i) We commissioned external consultants in July 1989 to carry out research on employers' reactions to the new literature which had been issued in April 1989 on national insurance contributions (NICs) and statutory sick pay (SSP). The research showed that the new literature was considered a great improvement over the old. Additional ways of improving our communications package were identified and some of the documents were revised accordingly in April 1990.

New guidance on statutory maternity pay (SMP) has been produced; a new SMP chapter has been added to the employers' "Quick Guide", which previously contained only SSP and NIC information, and a SMP manual became available in April 1990.

A fact card, which explains company directors' NICs in a simple way, was distributed to employers in April 1990. A company directors' NICs booklet which gives detailed guidance on this area has also been produced.

(ii) In January 1990 we launched a free seminar service for employers to help them administer SSP and SMP. This was introduced with the small employer particularly in mind and the national extension of this service followed a successful pilot exercise in Scotland. During the period January 1990 to June 1990, 1,228 people attended 103 seminars.

(iii) We have commissioned the Institute of Data Processing Management (IDPM) to produce a test pack, for producers of payroll software, to enable them to test the SSP and SMP components against Departmental standards. This is an extension of the IDPM's existing payroll evaluation service and has benefits for software producers and employers alike. Software producers can ensure the accuracy of their product and advertise it accordingly. Employers will be able to purchase, with confidence, software which will greatly assist them in the administration of SSP and SMP.

(iv) In November 1989 the Department held the inaugural meeting of the new DSS employers' advisory panel. The panel is made up of small business people, representatives of employers' organisations including the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses Ltd. and the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, and payroll managers. The panel advises the Department on policy, procedures and communications with business.

(v) We give prominence, on our training courses for purchasing staff, to the need to consider using small firms, and give each participant copies of Department of Employment booklets "Think Big Buy Small" and "Tendering For Government Contracts".

We have not designed performance indicators specifically for monitoring achievements in this area but the Department has a system to monitor proposals which impact on business, to ensure that the needs of small businesses are taken into account. We attach particular importance to action taken to help small firms and will continue to explore further ways of doing so.

School Meals

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children were eligible for free school meals in 1985; and how many are currently eligible.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In 1985, children in families receiving supplementary benefit or family income supplement were eligible for free school meals. The number of children of school age, aged five and over, in such families at that time was:

	Number
Supplementary Benefit	[1]1,431,000
Family Income Supplement	[2]288,000

[1] February 1986: the nearest date for which information is available.
[2] October 1985.

No information is available about the number of children eligible under the local authority discretionary schemes which existed in 1985.

Currently, only children in families receiving income support are eligible for free school meals. The latest information relates to May 1989 when there were 1,309,000 children aged five or over in such families. When family credit replaced family income supplement in 1988 the children's rates were set at a higher level to provide help in cash in place of free school meals. In April 1990 there were 446,000 children aged five or over in family credit families.

Severe Disability Premium

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will now make a statement on the Government's response to the social security commissioners' decision in the case for severe disability premium of Simon Crompton; and how many other severely disabled people have already benefited or will benefit from the decision.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The regulation with which this commissioner's decision is concerned was amended from 9 October 1989. Information on the number of people who benefited under the reinterpretation of the unamended regulation is not yet available.

Pensioners, Wirral

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether pensioners over 75 years of age living in the Wirral have been paid the additional housing benefit to which they are entitled following the Government's changes in the rules for those aged over 75 years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I am aware that the metropolitan borough of Wirral was not able to implement the changes to the housing benefit scheme in October 1989. The authority overcame its difficulty by the end of January 1990 and all pensioners should now be receiving their proper housing benefit entitlement.

Scottish Pensioners

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many senior citizens in Scotland received state benefits additional to the standard pension in the periods (a) April 1987 to April 1988, (b) April 1988 to April 1989 and (c) April 1989 to April 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest version of the family expenditure survey (1987) shows that in Scotland 65 per cent. of pensioners in receipt of the retirement pension and supplementary benefit received at least one other social security benefit. It is not possible from the family expenditure survey to separate accurately retirement pension and supplementary benefit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will take steps to increase the percentage of departmental Select Committee reports debated on the Floor of the House on substantive motions.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No. Although only a small number of debates have taken place on substantive motions there have been innumerable debates which have Select Committee reports tagged as relevant to the debate. The number of such reports could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Telephone Services

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether, in drawing up proposals to widen the facilities available to make telephone calls to institutions of the European Commission, he will consider the possibility of using the services offered by Mercury.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The question of introducing the services offered by Mercury Telecommunications to the House exchange was addressed in the first report this Session from the Services Committee; and is to be further considered this autumn by the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee. I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's request is included in that consideration.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement on the policies pursued by the House of Commons (Services) Committee to help small businesses; and what steps have been taken to develop performance indicators by which these achievements can be monitored.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The House of Commons (Services) Committee has no responsibility in these matters.

Broadcasting

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Lord President of the Council if there are any plans to arrange for a publicly broadcast trial of provision for the use of subtitling and sign language in televising the proceedings of the House as suggested by the Royal National Institute for the Deaf; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: This is a matter which the Select Committee on Televising of Proceedings of the House, and its successor Committee, will be considering in the autumn, in consultation with the broadcasters, once the detailed evaluations of the signing and subtitling trials recently organised by the Select Committee are available.

ENERGY

British Coal

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the European Commissioner responsible for competition policy regarding the three-year coal contract between British Coal and the electricity generation companies.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no present plans to do so.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received from the European Commission regarding the pricing structure of British Coal's contract with the two electricity generators and its impact on private mine operators.

Mr. Baldry: The Commission is keen to see the transition to a fully competitive coal market and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has assured it of the importance which the Government attach to private mine operators having a full and fair opportunity to supply the power station market.

Flue Gas Desulphurisation

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give the proportion of coal and oil-fired installed capacity for electricity generators fitted with flue gas desulphurisation in Japan, West Germany and Great Britain, the time scale for completion, and the cost per £ kilowatt installed.

Mr. Baldry: The latest available published information can be found in the OECD-IEA publication "Coal Information 1990", a copy of which can be obtained from the House Library.

Coal and Electricity

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what requests for information he has received from the European Commission regarding the impact on competition in the coal industry and the electricity generation industry of the three-year coal contract between British Coal and National Power and PowerGen.

Mr. Baldry: The Commission has received memoranda and other information both from my Department and from the coal and electricity industries.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are his proposals for employees and pensioners of the electricity industry in England and Wales to participate in the forthcoming share offers; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: The Government welcome the opportunity which privatisation of the electricity supply industry provides for employees to become shareholders in the new companies.

Employees will be offered free shares to a fully paid value of about £140, plus shares at a fully paid value of about £2 for every year of continuous service in the electricity supply industry up to a date close to flotation.

Employees will also be offered two free fully paid shares for every share bought at the offer price on a matching basis up to a maximum fully paid value of about £440 worth of free shares. Under this element of the package, if an employee bought shares with a fully paid value of £220, he would receive free shares to a fully paid value of £440.

Employees will be able to buy shares up to a maximum fully paid value of about £1,250 of additional shares at a discount of 20 per cent. from the offer price.

Employees applying for shares will be treated on a priority basis, over the general public, up to an individual fully paid limit of shares worth about £15,000. This may be subject to scaling down if the number of shares in any one company applied for by employees and pensioners exceeds a prescribed proportion of the total number of shares on offer.

The free and matching shares will be available to employees who satisfy certain minimum qualification periods on length of employment and hours worked per week. The discount and priority shares will be available to each person employed in the electricity industry at a date close to the flotation date.

We have also decided that pensioners of the companies should be able to apply on a priority basis, over the general public, for shares up to a fully paid limit of about £15,000, subject to any necessary scaling down.

We have also made special arrangements for employees of the National Grid Company, the Electricity Association and Nuclear Electric which will not be floated on the stock exchange. National Grid Company employees and Electricity Association employees will receive offers on terms similar to those of the RECs' employees, but in all 12 of the regional electricity companies; Nuclear Electric employees will receive offers for shares in National Power, also on similar terms.

I announced yesterday, in my statement on PowerGen, that in the event of a trade sale arrangements would also be made for PowerGen employees to receive benefits broadly comparable in financial terms.

Further details of the share offer arrangements will be made available to employees and pensioners in due course, including those resulting from Inland Revenue, stock exchange and other requirements applying to these offers.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list those companies which have approached him regarding a trade sale of any part or subsidiary of any of the electricity generating or distribution companies.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's statement yesterday, Official Report, columns 39-51.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he has had with the quotations committee of the international stock exchange regarding exemptions for each or any of the electricity supply industry companies from the minimum three-year profit and loss account track record before flotation.

Mr. Baldry: No such exemptions have been sought.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Wakeham: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance. The success of their policies is demonstrated by the latest statistics which show a record increase in the number of businesses registered for VAT, of 1,700 a week during 1989. Over the decade the overall increase has been 373,000.

In developing and implementing my Department's policies, full account is taken of the needs of small businesses. They have benefited from measures to encourage competition and stimulate energy efficiency.

The Coal Industry Act 1990 provides a modest, but significant, measure of liberalisation for the United Kingdom coal market by raising the tonnage limit on licensed—non-British Coal—opencast sites and the manpower limit on licensed deep mines. The Government have continued to make available funding for British Coal Enterprise Ltd. resulting in a cumulative total of 61,000 job opportunities, many of which are in small businesses, in 2,865 individual projects—this compares with 41,041 and 2,600 respectively in 1989.

The new regime for the electricity supply industry will have the effect of opening up the supply of electricity to competition, will give small businesses a choice of electricity supplier and put downward pressure on the prices they pay.

Officials are encouraged to use small firms for departmental purchases of goods and services where this is consistent with obtaining value for money. About 43 per cent. of purchases have been from them in 1989-90 compared with 38 per cent. in 1988-89. A booklet "Selling to the Department of Energy—a guide to firms wishing to supply the Department with goods and services" has recently been produced and should be of particular benefit to small firms.

Electricity Sales

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he has had with the director general of the Office of Electricity Regulation about the upper limit on direct sales by the generating companies to above 1 MW customers.

Mr. Baldry: My officials are in regular contact with the office of the Director General of Electricity Supply on regulatory matters. Before announcing his recent decision on the direct sales limits at the end of May the director wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State informing him of his conclusions.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list those proposed independent electricity generation projects which incorporate combined heat and power technology.

Mr. Moynihan: The proposed projects that incorporate combined heat and power technology and that have been made public are as follows:

Company	Location
South East London CHP	London
Forth Energy Ltd.	Newcastle
Sheffield Heat and Power	Sheffield
Shell	Shellhaven
Mobil Oil Co. Ltd.	Coryton
ICI/Enron	Teeside
British Nuclear Fuels	Calderhall
Texaco/Mission Energy	Pembroke

Electricity Generation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the number of independent electricity generation projects which (a) include electricity distribution companies in the owning consortium and (b) do not include any such companies.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend is aware of the regional electricity companies' interest in a number of independent electricity generation projects. Participation in such schemes is a commercial matter and it is for the companies themselves to decide whether they wish to hold an equity interest in any particular project.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received regarding the participation of the electricity distribution companies in electricity generating consortia.

Mr. Baldry: Decisions to invest in independent generation projects are matters for the company concerned.

HEALTH

Iodine 125

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment has been made of the incidence of iodine 125 in thyroid glands in the London area.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department has recently received a draft report of research funded by the Department of the Environment entitled "Iodine 125—its distribution in the United Kingdom from measurements and biological monitoring, and absorbed doses (individual and collective) derived from measured activities in human thyroids". In accordance with normal practice, the Department has referred the draft report for peer-review. However, I am advised by the Department of the Environment that levels of radioactivity in the River Thames are extremely low and that the levels in drinking water are well below the guideline values recommended by the World Health Organisation and the International Commission on Radiological Protection.

Dedicated Clinics

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to provide additional dedicated clinics for family planning and the menopause.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The level of provision of menopause and family planning clinic services is a matter for individual health authorities to determine in the light of local needs and priorities. Guidance issued by the Department asks health authorities to strike a proper balance between services provided by specialist clinics and those provided by GPs, bearing in mind matters such as clinics' wider health role.

Self-governing Hospitals

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many expressions of interest have been received for self-governing hospitals and other units; and how many formal applications have been submitted.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: So far, 200 units have expressed an interest in becoming self-governing. A total of 59 formal applications have been received to date.

NHS Reforms

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the effect of the proposed national health service reforms on national health service efficiency.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The national health service reforms will introduce NHS contracts—or service agreements—between health authorities and GP fund holders on one side, and hospitals and other units on the other. These agreements will specify the cost, volume and quality of services to be provided. This specification of services in contracts will provide an incentive to ensure that resources go more directly to the hospitals or units which provide the best quality and best value care. This will be an important stimulus in making the national health service more efficient.

AIDS

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his assessment of the proportion of people with HIV infection who will go on to develop full-blown AIDS.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The latest estimate on the proportion of people infected with HIV who will progress to AIDS from the San Francisco city clinic cohort study of 489 homosexual men is 53 per cent. at 11·1 years. By 1990, of those known to have been infected between 1977 and 1980, 61 per cent. had developed AIDS and a further 18 per cent. had AIDS-related complex. Only 14 per cent. of those infected with HIV for 10 years or longer did not show physiological markers of damage to the immune system. Data from studies of other groups of people infected with HIV including injecting drug misusers show similar rates of progression.

Since 1987 the use of zidovudine has been reducing the rate at which people with early HIV disease progress to AIDS. It is probable that zidovudine only temporarily halts the progress of the disease. Current information suggests that at least 75 per cent. of people infected with HIV will develop AIDS and this figure may eventually rise to over 90 per cent.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what communications he has had with Dr. Perutz and his colleagues concerning the dissemination of information about AIDS since 12 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have not been in communication with Dr. Perutz, but the Department contacted a number of Dr. Perutz's medical and scientific colleagues about the content of the Channel 4 programme "Despatches". The issues raised in the programme, which appeared to be based on a misunderstanding of the nature of AIDS, have subsequently been the subject of correspondence in the medical and scientific press and in newspapers. Dr. Anthony Pinching appeared on television with the producer of the programme and refuted many of its claims. We are grateful to Dr. Perutz for his action in writing to the press drawing attention to the erroneous information contained in the programme.

Programmes of this kind underline the importance of public education initiatives which have already begun to reduce the spread of HIV infection in the United Kingdom, and point to the need for a continuing programme of education to sustain public awareness and knowledge, and influence behaviour.

Community Care

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received concerning his plans for care in the community.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We receive many representations in correspondence and at regular meetings with organisations concerned with our plans for community care.

Free Prescriptions

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will add pernicious anaemia to the list of chronic illnesses for which free prescriptions are available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No.

Eye Tests

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated saving to the Exchequer from the abolition of free eye tests in financial year 1989-90; and what is the estimate for 1990-91.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The estimated saving for 1989-90, in England, is £70 million, and for 1990-91, is £90 million.

Mentally Ill People

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what specific areas of possible need for social care will be included in local authority assessments of mentally ill people in hospital, under the care programme approach; and whether authorities will receive guidance from his Department about this.

Mr. Dorrell: For each person suffering from a serious mental illness, adequate arrangements need to be made for that individual's accommodation and meals. In addition, it may be necessary to provide social care services such as the home help service. It is for health and social services professional staff to judge what health and social care services are necessary in each case.

The Department intends to issue a circular shortly, setting out the requirement to introduce the care programme approach from 1 April 1991, and giving some guidance.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each regional secure unit, the number of patients detained under the Mental Health Act 1983; and how many were informal patients for the latest available date.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not currently available centrally.

Bethlem and Maudsley Health Authority

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representation he has received about the plan by the Bethlem and Maudsley special health authority to reduce the range of services it offers, and the closure of Hilda Lewis house; if he will make additional funds available to the authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: There are no plans to close Hilda Lewis house, nor are there any plans to reduce permanently the range of services offered by the special health authority (SHA). Earlier this year we received nine representations about the authority's plans to implement a number of temporary measures designed to make the most efficient use of its valuable clinical resources. We have now received a further three representations about Hilda Lewis house.

The changes taking place within Hilda Lewis house are part of a movement towards short-stay and outreach services within the community. This reflects a changing pattern of need and is in line with long-term objectives for the configuration of psychiatric care. Child and adolescent services make a heavy demand on resources and the SHA is aiming to continue to provide these very important services in the most effective and efficient way.

The SHA received a revenue allocation of £27·1 million in 1990-91. It benefited from the national average growth in resources which represents a cash increase of almost £2 million over 1989-90. It is for the health authority to decide how best to allocate these resources in providing the services required to support its national teaching and research role.

Dental Checks

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated saving to the Exchequer from the abolition of free dental check-ups in financial year 1989-90; and what is the estimate for 1990-91.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The estimated income from dental examination charges in England in 1989-90 was £50 million. We anticipate revenue of some £55 million in 1990-91.

Psychiatric Hospitals

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many psychiatric patients have been discharged from psychiatric hospitals in the last year for which records are conveniently available; and how many have been traced to local authority care.

Mr. Dorrell: The information available centrally is shown in the table. The number of finished district spells is not equivalent to the number of patients discharged as some patients may be admitted more than once during the year.

Finished district spells for NHS hospitals in 1987-88

Clinical speciality	Total	(a) Duration of stay		(b) Intended destination on discharge
		Less than 12 months	12 months or more	Usual residence	Local authority residential accommodation	Elsewhere
Mental illness	181,400	177,500	3,900	163,100	3,900	14,400
Mental handicap	35,000	32,500	2,500	32,800	700	1,500
Total	216,400	210,000	6,400	195,900	4,600	15,900

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Dorrell: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance. It is the policy of the Department and the NHS to provide equal opportunity to all potential suppliers, of whatever size, to trade on a value-for-money basis. This policy continues to underpin all NHS and departmental contracts with external suppliers. To help small businesses a guide on how to do business with the NHS has been published and is currently being reviewed. Two joint CBI/NHS seminars have been held in the past year where it has been emphasised that quality counts more than size of business. In addition, the NHS procurement directorate and NHS supplies departments respond to a large number of individual requests for advice and guidance from small businesses that wish to enter the NHS market or have other trading problems they wish to resolve. The NHS deals with several thousand suppliers through over 3,000 delivery points. It is not practicable to monitor centrally the precise extent to which the NHS draws on small businesses but it is estimated that some 80 per cent. of suppliers fall into the small to medium-size category.

GP Budgets

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the cash-limited budget for general practitioner ancillary staff in the current financial year;

(2) what is the general practitioner premises cash-limited budget for the current financial year.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply the then Under-Secretary of State gave my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) on 1 May at column 519. We expect shortly to announce a further substantial increase in resources for final allocations to FPCs to meet in full the actual level of commitments for practice staff reimbursement and premises improvements as at 31 March 1990.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the date from which health service managers base success in reducing waiting lists will be calculated;

(2) what factors will be taken into consideration in determining whether health service managers' remuneration should be reduced for failing to reduce waiting lists;

(3) which health service managers will have their remuneration linked to the reduction of waiting lists.

Mr. Dorrell: The national health service managers eligible for performance-related pay are regional, district and unit general managers, and those senior managers below general manager level who have accepted a performance-linked contract.

Awards of performance-related pay depend on the manager's achievement of objectives set each year under the individual performance review system. The objectives for regional general managers are set by regional chairmen in consultation with the chief executive of the national health service management executive and this process is repeated at succeeding management levels.

In setting an individual manager's objectives we consider the existing standard of the services for which he or she is responsible and deficiencies which need to be remedied. Thus a regional general manager in whose region there are unacceptably long waiting times will be required as part of his or her objectives to secure their reduction by an agreed margin. Regional chairmen and general managers will in turn be responsible for ensuring that suitable objectives are set for the managers reporting to them. The management executive will be agreeing with regional health authorities in the autumn reviews specific targets for the reduction in the number of patients waiting over one year for treatment in the period to March 1992.

Performance is assessed each year against all the objectives set for a manager.

Health Conference, London

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who was invited to the special health conference in London on 17 July.

Mr. Dorrell: Invitations were issued to chairmen and general managers of regional and district health authorities, family practitioner committees, and the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospital and also to members of the national health service management executive and the national health service policy board.

Prescribing

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list and place in the Library a copy of any guidelines or advice his Department has offered to family practitioner committees in respect of the responsibility assumed by them in April for giving advice to general practitioners on prescribing.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 23 July.

Allergy

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has in respect of the number of people affected by pollen in (a) 1990, (b) 1985 and (c) 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally.

Epoxy Resin

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has identified any possible public health implications resulting from the use of epoxy resin to line water mains; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department of Health Committee on the Medical Aspects of the Contamination of Air, Soil and Water has reviewed reports of laboratory and field tests to determine concentrations of leached chemicals and toxicological tests on the major components of one formulation of epoxy resin. They advised that the epoxy resin could be approved for relining water mains in situ. This was taken into account by the Department of the Environment's Committee on Chemicals and Materials of Construction for Use in Public Water Supplies and Swimming Pools, which approved this formulation of epoxy resin in March 1989 for use for in situ relining of water mains.

Great Ormond Street Hospital

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, further to his answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 570, to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, what was the total claim against Cusdin, Burden and Howitt, R. T. James and Partners and McLaughlin and Harvey Ltd., respectively; and what was the final settlement in each case.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The total cost of remedial works for the cardiac wing at Great Ormond Street hospital amounted to some £21 million. In accordance with advice from leading counsel, an out-of-court settlement was reached with each of the parties involved. In this settlement the health authority received £425,000 from Cusdin, Burden and Howitt and £8 million from R. T. James and Partners. On withdrawal of its counter-claim against the health authority, McLaughlin and Harvey Ltd. received £90,000.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will end the liability of people who live over their shops to pay both business rates and community charge.

Mr. Nicholls: It would be inappropriate to change the fundamental liability for either the community charge or the business rate of people who live on their business premises, because adults generally have to pay a personal charge irrespective of where they live, and rates are paid on all non-domestic property. However, we recognise that the occupiers of composite hereditaments with lower rateable values may need a longer period to adapt to the higher bills which they face under the new system. I refer my hon. Friend to the statement made on 19 July by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Official Report, columns 1185-89.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the community charge liability of a single householder who leaves his only house furnished but not occupied in order to do voluntary service overseas for a period of (a) three months, (b) six months and (c) nine months in a community charge year.

Mr. Nicholls: The community charge registration officer for an area determines the residence of an individual taking account whether a move abroad is temporary or permanent. Where the move is permanent, no personal community charge is payable, but a standard charge may arise on any furnished property remaining which is no one's main home. The amount of standard charge will depend in a particular case on whether a maximum multiplier has been prescribed by the Secretary of State or, if it has not, whether the local authority has used its discretion to specify classes of circumstances where a multiplier of less than the maximum may apply.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to end the entitlement of the mature student spouse of a top income tax rate payer to pay the reduced rate of 20 per cent. community charge.

Mr. Nicholls: A very small proportion of full-time students have employment-related or private income which attracts income tax at the higher rate. The administrative cost of screening about 500,000 students, the overwhelming majority of whom have incomes which would qualify for maximum community charge benefit, would greatly exceed the increased charge revenue collected from such a small group, to the disadvantage of all charge payers and taxpayers.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the liability of housebuilders for standard community charge on new houses which they have not sold; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: I have received a number of representations from the housebuilding industry. We have provided for no standard charge to be payable on properties whose construction is not complete and for six months thereafter unless the property becomes occupied before that date. Local authorities have the discretion to extend that period of time, and may wish to take into account the prevailing state of the housing market.

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with those local authorities that have been charge-capped on the problems of raising community charge income over a reduced period; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with those local authorities that have been charge-capped about the problems of raising the community charge income over a reduced period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Of the 17 authorities which put forward alternatives to the caps I originally proposed, a number made representations about the collection of community charges. My right hon. Friend considered all relevant information including any representations made by authorities before taking his decisions on the final caps, which were approved by the House on 12 July.

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about proposed amendments to the operation of the poll tax.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend did so on 19 July.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 6 July, if he will publish the overall percentage increase in rate bills in 1990-91 as against 1989-90 of (a) shops, (b) factories, (c) hotels and boarding houses, (d) offices and (e) mines, in total, by economic regions, and for Walsall metropolitan borough council (i) including the effects of transitional relief and (ii) excluding the effects of transitional relief.

Mr. Nicholls: The percentage change represented by the figures given in my reply of 6 July, with the addition of similar information in respect of Walsall metropolitan borough council, is shown in the table.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance the Government have issued in respect of the treatment by charging authorities of teachers in boarding schools who occupy tied accommodation in performance of their job for community charge purposes in respect of that accommodation; and whether this position is affected in any way by the designation given to such a teacher's own and separate property.

Mr. Nicholls: Guidance has been given to local authorities on the interpretation of sole or main residence in community charge practice note No. 9. Guidance was also given last year on the scope of local authorities' discretion to specify their own classes of standard charge property. One example given of possible additional classes was property which is empty because the owner is required to live elsewhere as a condition of his or her employment. However, we have now proposed that the Government should prescribe centrally such a class of property, limiting the maximum multiplier an authority may set to one times the personal charge. Our proposals are contained in the consultation paper "The Standard Community Charge and Other Matters", copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those local authorities whose expenditure per capita for the current year is less than the level of central support received by (a) Westminster and (b) Wandsworth, expressed as a per capita figure.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 23 July 1990]: Since most authorities' spending per capita is less than central Government support per capita for Westminster and Wandsworth the question has been answered in terms of local authorities whose expenditure per capita exceeds or is equal to the level of central Government support per capita for Westminster and Wandsworth. The authorities are as follows:

(a) Authorities whose expenditure per capita is greater than or equal to central Government support received by Westminster.

City of London
Islington
Tower Hamlets
Manchester

Kensington and Chelsea	Wolverhampton
Camden	Salford
Newham	Coventry
Brent	Sandwell
Liverpool	Bradford
Westminster	Walsall
Birmingham	Wirral
Wandsworth	Gateshead
Waltham Forest	Calderdale
Newcastle-Upon-Tyne	Oldham
Knowsley	Kirklees
Ealing	South Tyneside

(b) Authorities whose expenditure per capita is greater than or equal to central Government support received by Wandsworth.

Bolton	Barking and Dagenham
Sunderland	Kingston-Upon-Thames
Richmond-Upon-Thames	Trafford
Sheffield	Leeds
Wigan	Croydon
Enfield	Sefton
Tameside	Bury
Merton	Harrow
Cleveland	Stockport
Rotherham

All other authorities receive less.

Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total sum that would have been raised by councils in England in 1990-91 from the community charge if Government guidelines had been followed; what information he has as to the total sum that will be raised; what was the total sum raised from domestic rates in England in 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 23 July 1990]: Had authorities spent at the level of their standard spending assessments they would have raised £7·9 billion from personal and collective charges. Authorities have budgeted to receive £10·5 billion from charges. These figures exclude community charge benefits and transitional relief. Net domestic rate income in 1989-90 was £8·4 billion.

It is for local authorities to justify their levels of spending to their charge payers.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many people in the population the Government estimate to be eligible to pay 20 per cent. of their poll tax bill; how many such people are on the poll tax registers; and how many he estimates will pay their 20 per cent.;

(2) what is the estimated revenue that will be received in 1990-91 from those who are required to pay 20 per cent. of their poll tax.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 23 July 1990]: Some 4·5 million people are estimated to be paying 20 per cent. of the personal community charge. Community charges registration officers have a duty to maintain an accurate register of those subject to the charge. All of those liable are obliged to contribute towards the costs of local services.

No separate estimates of revenue received from such charge payers have been made.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in descending order from highest to lowest the demand on the collection fund per adult as shown on the community charge bill for each borough or district council in Essex.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 19 July 1990]: The information is given in the table:

	Demand per adult £
Basildon	233·96
Harlow	210·10
Thurrock	163·40
Southend-on-Sea	160·36
Brentwood	138·91
Castle Point	107·64
Chelmsford	106·99
Tendring	105·86
Rochford	93·57
Braintree	88·29
Epping Forest	81·54
Colchester	80·98
Maldon	73·20
Uttlesford	63·99

Notes:

1. Figures may not correspond precisely with those shown on charge bills because for parts of some authorities the demand may include expenditure on special expenses for which only charge payers in those areas contribute.
2. Differences in demand per adult may be affected by differences in the spending needs of authorities, their use of financial resources and their efficiency in service delivery.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the review of the community charge arrangements as they affect small bed-and-breakfast establishments.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 17 July 1990]: I refer to the statement made on 19 July by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Official Report, columns 1185-89.

Commons

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his written answer of 27 November 1989 to the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr), when he proposes to introduce legislation to deal with the acknowledged deficiencies in the Commons Registration Act 1965; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) on 18 July, Official Report, column 562.

Japanese Knotweed

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the extent, environmental impact and rate of spread of Japanese knotweed; whether he is currently funding any relevant research; and whether he has any proposals to control its rate of spread.

Mr. Trippier: Japanese knotweed is regarded as a troublesome pest in much of Wales and parts of north-west and south-east England. I am advised that Welsh Water has conducted field trials on methods of controlling this species and that the Nature Conservancy Council takes steps to control it on sites important to wildlife.

The most effective chemical treatments are picloram and glyphosate—only glyphosate should be used on sites adjacent to water. Uprooting small plants and regular cutting or mowing also help to deter the plant's growth and spread over particular sites.

Sewerage System

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was spent on repairs and modernisation of the sewerage system in the 1980s.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In England between 1980-81 and 1988-89 the then regional water authorities spent £2,899 million, in November 1989 prices, on sewerage services.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the nature of the hazardous waste shipped to England for disposal from United States military bases in Turkey, Greece, the Azores and Iceland during the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Records of imports of hazardous waste from United States military bases in these countries consigned under the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980 are kept by the disposal authorities concerned. The Department of the Environment has no record of any such imports being notified under the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations introduced in 1988. The Government are discussing with the United States authorities whether disposal in the United Kingdom should continue to be an option in the future.

Government Advertising

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much the Government have spent on poll tax advertisements (a) during the Bill's passage through Parliament and (b) since, on (i) television, (ii) radio, (iii) newspapers, (iv) leaflets and (v) magazines.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government have commissioned no advertisements for the community charge, either during or since the parliamentary passage of the Local Government Finance Act 1988, to which I assume the hon. Member refers.

Since enactment, my Department has, however, produced and maintained a range of leaflets on individuals' rights and duties under the community charge system, which are available free on request; distributed a leaflet to all households in England when most councils started to compile their registers last year, and took advertising to draw attention to the leaflet; and mounted an information campaign earlier this year to draw people's attention to the availability of community charge benefit and transitional relief, and how to claim them. The rounded costs involved are set out in the table:

Television advertising	1,624
Radio advertising	282
Newpapers (including freesheets and minority language papers)	1,563
Leaflets (including the household leaflet)	1,645
Magazines	266

In addition the cost of distributing the household leaflet was £301,000.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has more recently commissioned newspaper advertisements publicising the increased capital limit for community charge benefit announced in the Budget and reminding people of the time limit for making backdated claims and of the income levels likely to entitle people to benefit. My right hon. Friend has also produced free leaflets and a poster on how to claim community charge benefit and on the increased capital limits for income-related benefits.

Beaches

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list in the Official Report those bathing beaches which did reach an EEC satisfactory standard at the most recent test report, covering 1988;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report those bathing beaches which did not reach the EEC satisfactory standard at the most recent test report, covering 1988.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The results for the 1988 bathing season were placed in the Library on 21 February 1989. The results for the 1989 bathing season were placed in the Library on 25 January 1990.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his present estimate of the level of inflation which will apply or be assumed to be likely to apply to local government expenditure in 1991-92.

Mr. Chope: The proposals for local authority spending in 1991-92 announced by my right hon. Friend on 19 July were not based on any particular estimate of inflation, but reflected a judgment about the appropriate level of spending taking account of all relevant factors.

Building Firms (Contracts)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contracts were given to Messrs. Wimpeys, Mowlems, Taylor Woodrow, Tarmac, Kier Construction, Laings, Balfour Beatty and Eden Construction in excess of £1 million by value in the years 1985-86, 1987-88 and 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: The number of contracts in each of the years referred to, and their aggregate value, was:

	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90
Wimpeys	3—8·9	2—22·0	5—22·6	2—14·6	4—7·8
Mowlems	9—52·3	4—12·6	8—16·2	5—12·5	4—63·9
Taylor Woodrow	—	3—10·1	3—34·3	—	5—65·6
Tarmac	9—82·0	4—27·2	4—96·8	6—17·1	8—67·4
Kier	4—8·4	5—13·7	7—19·0	5—48·8	5—16·1
Laings	4—14·4	6—23·9	10—57·7	2—95·2	4—22·3
Balfour Beatty	7—46·1	5—19·4	4—20·8	2—5·2	8—21·7

Eden Construction Ltd. is a wholly owned subsidiary of Lilley plc and no separate contracts were entered into with Eden Construction during the years referred to. Lilley plc was awarded four contracts with an aggregate value of some £5·8 million.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance. While separate information on small businesses is not available in my Department, the major deregulation initiatives affecting all businesses were set out in the White Paper "Releasing Enterprise" (Cm 512). These included simplification and clarification of the building regulations to limit requirements to those essential for securing the health and safety of people and for the protection of the environment; and to introduce a greater degree of flexibility.

I have also proposed a series of changes to the planning system designed to simplify procedures. In particular, specific relaxations of permitted development rights for commercial and other uses under the general development order are currently the subject of consultation. The Government have also asked that local authorities deal promptly and positively with planning proposals from small businesses.

Proposals to establish the system of integrated pollution control were also set out in the White Paper: this will be less administratively burdensome to industry than the arrangements it replaces. IPC will be given statutory force by the Environmental Protection Bill.

Habitat Protection

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the extent within the United Kingdom of the habitats listed in annex 4 to the proposal for a Council directive on the protection of natural and semi-natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora which was issued by the European Commission on 30 March; to what extent the habitats listed in the annex are already covered by notified sites of special scientific interest; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: We are taking advice from the Nature Conservancy Council as and when necessary on technical matters relating to the proposed EC habitats directive. However, no realistic assessment of the implications for the United Kingdom of the proposed annex 4 can be made until the current confusion over annex 5 (criteria for designation) has been resolved. We continue to press the Commission for clarification on this point.

Rural Areas

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any proposals to allow district councils to use more of their capital receipts to combat problems facing rural areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: No. The rules on capital receipts in the new capital finance system enable us to target resources more effectively on the needs facing all local authorities.

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 20 December, Official Report, column 330, what is his assessment of the effect on rate bills of the uniform business rate and the non-domestic revaluation, based on the local rating lists which came into force on 1 April.

Mr. Nicholls: I am placing in the Library an analysis of the combined effects of the revaluation and the introduction of the uniform business rate in England and Wales.

Between December and April there was a net addition to the rating lists representing an increase of about 2 to 3 per cent. in rateable values and rate bills. Overall the average by which rateable values have increased for properties occupied by private businesses and the nationalised industries has risen slightly to 8.1 times in England and to 8.5 times in Wales. The changes to the rating lists reflect the correction of errors, revisions based on later information or new regulations and the addition of new properties completed after the December lists were published

County Hall, London

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will make an announcement about the future development of county hall, London.

Mr. Chris Patten: Last autumn a public inquiry was held into proposals for the redevelopment of the county hall complex. Following consideration of my inspector's report, my Department has today written to the appellants indicating my willingness to defer decisions on their appeals so as to allow them the opportunity to amend the proposals to overcome objections related to a relatively small part of the overall scheme. The letter and inspector's report have been copied to all parties who made representations to the inspector at the inquiry.

Air Pollution Control

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to issue advice to local authorities on the exercise of their new air pollution control functions under part I of the Environmental Protection Bill.

Mr. Trippier: The new system of air pollution control being established under part I of the Bill represents a major strengthening of local authorities' powers over polluting industry.

It is important that local authorities work to a common set of standards and I intend that no process should be scheduled for local authority control until relevant guidance has been published. More than 70 guidance notes will be needed, and we are well on target to produce them. The final drafts of the first seven notes, produced with the assistance of the local authorities and industry, have today been circulated to interested parties for comment and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Through the guidance notes, not only local authorities, but industry and the public will be aware of the standards of air pollution control we expect to be achieved.

Pollution Regulatory Authorities

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on proposals for cost-recovery charging for pollution regulatory authorities' costs.

Mr. Trippier: On 30 January this year I announced that, subject to enactment of the Environmental Protection Bill, cost-recovery charges to meet the costs of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution (HMIP) and the National Rivers Authority in administering integrated pollution control (IPC) would be introduced as from April 1991; and that the scheme would be based on an application fee payable when a process is submitted for IPC authorisation and an annual charge payable for holding each authorisation to cover the on-going costs of compliance monitoring. The level of charges for a particular plant would be linked to the number of specified "components" which it comprised, thus relating the amount payable to the size and complexity of the plant concerned.

My Department has now published a consultation paper on proposals for the detailed operation of this scheme, inviting comment from industry, environmental groups and others with an interest.

The paper also sets out proposals for charging schemes for local authority air pollution control of the "part B" process, and for the regulation of premises under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960.

I have placed a copy of the paper in the Library.

Integrated Pollution Control

Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the timing of the implementation of integrated pollution control.

Mr. Trippier: I have received a number of representations from a variety of sources which have suggested that an implementation date of 2 January 1991 means that there would be an inadequate period for consultation with interested parties and the public on guidance notes and regulations to be issued under part I of the Environmental Protection Bill. I have considered these representations most carefully. Royal Assent to the Bill is now expected later than had previously been anticipated. A delay will also enable Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution to broaden its training procedures for the implementation of IPC and associated work. I have decided therefore that IPC will now be implemented on 1 April 1991 for all new prescribed processes; prescribed processes undergoing a substantial change and large combustion plant. Other prescribed processes will be phased in over four years from 1 April 1992.

Telford Development Corporation

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for the wind-up date of Telford development corporation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Following statutory consultations under section 41 of the New Towns Act 1981, I have decided that Telford development corporation will be wound up on target on 30 September 1991. The necessary order will be made in due course.

Pollution, Port Talbot

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has received in respect of pollution by BP Chemicals at Baglen bay, Port Talbot; and what action it is proposed to take about it.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 20 July 1990]: I refer the right hon. and learned Member to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales on 20 July, Official Report, Vol. 176, columns 758-59.

Radon Gas

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set a limit on the fee which may be charged for carrying out tests for radon gas in domestic buildings.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 23 July 1990]: No. The National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) will carry out a free test for radon at the householder's request in all cases where the board judges that the nature of the area and the house warrant such testing. In other cases, the fee is a matter of negotiation with the organisation requested to carry out the test. The NRPB currently charges a fee of £26·40 plus VAT in those cases which do not justify a free test.

Direct Labour Organisation, Brent

Sir Rhodes Boyson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what use he intends to make of his sanction powers under part III of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 against the direct labour organisation of the London borough of Brent.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: On 20 December 1989, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State served a notice under section 19A of the 1980 Act on the London borough of Brent, setting out his view that the authority appeared to have failed to prepare the revenue account and statement of rate of return for the direct labour organisation's (DLO) activities in the financial year 1988-89; that it had failed to submit to him a report containing this information; and that it had failed to achieve the required rate of return on major new construction work.

My right hon. Friend has now considered the response which the authority has made to the section 19A notice, and accepts that the authority has now prepared the revenue account and statement of rate of return and has submitted the relevant report to him. He has noted, however, that the report shows that Brent's DLO made a loss of over £1 million on major new construction work in 1988-89, following a loss of slightly less than £1 million on this work in 1987-88. He has further noted that the authority decided in July 1989 that the DLO should withdraw from major new construction work, but that the authority has not precluded the possibility that the DLO might return to this area of work in the future.

My right hon. Friend has concluded that the record of financial failure by the DLO is such as to provide no confidence that it could achieve the required rate of return on major new construction work in the future. He has therefore today given a direction under section 19B of the 1980 Act prohibiting Brent's DLO from carrying out major new construction work.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

13. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by how much the total number of jobs in the United Kingdom has increased since 1979.

Mr. Howard: The number of jobs in the United Kingdom increased by 1·8 million between June 1979 and March 1990, the latest date for which information is available. It now stands at 27,198,000—the highest level ever.

17. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of unemployed people in the Gloucester constituency for the last month for which figures are available; and what percentage of that figure are long-term unemployed.

Mr. Jackson: There were 2,149 unemployed claimants in the parliamentary constituency of Gloucester in June 1990. For April 1990, the latest available date, about 27 per cent. of all claimants had been unemployed for more than a year.

20. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current level of unemployment in London.

Mr. Forth: In June 1990 unemployment in the London travel-to-work area was 186,168, 4·7 per cent. of the work force.

23. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest unemployment figures; and what were the most nearly comparable figures for June 1979.

Mr. Forth: In June 1990 the level of unemployment, seasonally adjusted, in the United Kingdom, was 1,617,100 compared with 1,069,000 in June 1979 on the consistent basis.

39. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current unemployment figures; and what was the most nearly comparable figure in June 1989.

Mr. Forth: In June 1990 seasonally adjusted unemployment in the United Kingdom was 1,617,100, compared with 1,811,300 in June 1989.

44. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on changes in the age profile of unemployed men and women in recent years.

Mr. Forth: As shown by the table, all age groups have seen sharp falls in the numbers unemployed over the past four years.

[1] Figures shown in brackets give the proportion of total unemployment in the given age group.
Note: The percentages do not add to 100 due to the exclusion from the table of those claimants aged under 18.

47. Mr. Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide the latest unemployment figures for Sheffield expressed as a percentage; and what is the national average.

Mr. Forth: In June 1990, the unemployment rate for the Sheffield travel-to-work area was 7·9 per cent. The comparable figure for the United Kingdom was 5·5 per cent. These figures are on the unadjusted basis.

48. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest figure for unfilled vacancies in the Basildon constituency.

Mr. Forth: Vacancy data for parliamentary constituencies are not available. However, the number of vacancies in the Basildon jobcentre area in June was 326.

57. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his latest estimate of the total number of employees who are counted twice in the employment totals.

Mr. Forth: The exact number of employees with two or more jobs included in the published employees in employment estimates is not known, since the estimates are based on figures collected from employers, who will not generally know if an employee is filling the post as an additional job.

However, evidence on the number of people with two jobs can be derived from the labour force survey (LFS). It is estimated from the preliminary results of the 1989 LFS that 623,000 employees (2·8 per cent. of the total) in Great Britain had a second job as an employee in spring 1989.

58. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the level of unemployment in the west midlands (a) in 1979 and (b) in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Forth: In June 1990 seasonally adjusted unemployment in the west midlands was 149,200, compared with 99,400 in June 1979.

68. Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of unemployed claimants in (a) Birkenhead and (b) the urban programme area, on 1 June 1983 and 1 January 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The table shows the number of unemployed claimants, in (a) Birkenhead parliamentary constituency and (b) Wirral local authority area, in which the Government target inner-city programme aid, for June 1983 and January 1990.

Total unemployed claimants

	June 1983	January 1990
Birkenhead	8,726	6,479
Wirral	23,554	16,025

Direct comparisons over the time are affected by various changes to the count and by seasonal influences.

69. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of people in work in Scotland in 1979; and what is the number today.

Mr. Forth: In June 1979, the civilian work force in employment for Scotland was 2,262,000. In March 1990, the latest date for which information is available, it stood at 2,281,000, an increase of 19,000.

71. Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest figure for people in full-time employment; and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

Mr. Forth: There were 20,232,000 people in full-time employment in Great Britain in March 1990, the latest date for which information is available. The earliest comparable information available is for March 1983 when there were 18,154,000 people in full-time employment. This represents an increase of 2,077,000 or 11 per cent.

Child Care

18. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will commission a study of the child care needs of working mothers.

Mr. Howard: My Department is contributing to the funding of the British social attitudes survey which includes questions on women's views of their child care needs. The need for any further research will be considered when the results of the survey are available.

Long-term Unemployed

19. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he intends to introduce to enable the long-term unemployed to receive training.

Mr. Howard: Employment training currently provides long-term unemployed people with a full range of opportunities to help them acquire the skills and experience they need to compete for jobs. Under training and enterprise councils training provision will become even more responsive to local needs.

21. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measure he intends to introduce to enable the long-term unemployed to participate fully in the work force.

Mr. Howard: Long-term unemployment has halved in the past two years. The wide range of employment and training measures which the Government have put in place have helped to achieve that objective.

36. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what further measures he proposes to take to help the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Jackson: The number of people unemployed for one year or more has fallen by almost half a million in the last two years and in that period long-term unemployment has fallen faster than total unemployment. Our success has been based on policies which have led to a large number of new jobs, and on an extensive range of employment and training measures which are kept under regular review to ensure that they continue successfully and cost-effectively to help long-term unemployed people get back into work.

Job Clubs

22. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how he intends to improve the work of job clubs.

Mr. Jackson: The job club programme is working well and continues to be very popular.

Current initiatives to improve the programme further include a new guide for external contractors; improvements to job club leader training; and pilots of special help for people with severe literacy or language difficulties.

Part-time and Temporary Work

24. Mr. Bright: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has made to the European Commission concerning its proposed directives on part-time and temporary work.

Mr. Howard: I have made it clear that the Government oppose the draft directives on the grounds that they would reduce job opportunities and damage competitiveness.

40. Mr. Donald Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of jobs in the United Kingdom are part-time.

Mr. Forth: Part-time employment in Great Britain constituted 24 per cent. (6,369,000) of the work force in employment in March 1990, the latest date for which information is available. Figures for part-time workers in Northern Ireland are not available.

Dock Labour Scheme

25. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the effects of the abolition of the dock labour scheme.

Mr. Howard: The industrial relations in the former scheme ports have been transformed; labour productivity has increased; and new business opportunities in and around the ports are booming as a direct result of the abolition of the dock labour scheme in July 1989.

51. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment has been made so far by his Department of the effect on business at British seaports of the abolition in 1989 of the dock labour scheme.

Mr. Howard: The July edition of the Employment Gazette contained an article, based on assessments carried out in 15 former national dock labour scheme ports, which reviewed developments which had occurred in the first year after the abolition of the scheme. It found that there had been substantial changes in the composition of the labour force; industrial relations in the docks had been transformed; labour was now being utilised much more flexibly; labour productivity had increased markedly; investment in the docks was beginning to increase and new business opportunities in and around the ports were developing; training was being approached more systematically and health and safety standards were being maintained.

Employment Training

26. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many students have completed training under the employment training scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Since its launch over 700,000 people have benefited from the opportunities provided by employment training. It is currently helping about 200,000 unemployed people to obtain the skills and experience they need to get and keep jobs. Under training and enterprise councils it will become even more responsive to local needs.

29. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the recontracting process for employment training.

Mr. Jackson: The recontracting exercise for employment training has been successful and 99 per cent. of providers have agreed new contracts.

66. Mr. Barry Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many students are currently undertaking training under the employment training scheme.

Mr. Jackson: An estimated 200,000 people are currently undertaking employment training.

Disabled People

27. Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his Department's review of employment services for disabled people.

Mr. Jackson: The results of the review were published on 29 June in a consultative document "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities". The document sets out our intentions for the development of services in the 1990s taking forward themes, established in the 1980s, of integration into the work force and the active commitment of employers to good practices in creating employment opportunities for people with disabilities. The document has been widely distributed and the period of consultation lasts to 31 December.

37. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he is taking to improve employment services to people with disabilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: A consultative document, "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities", was published by this Department on 29 June. The document sets out our intentions for the development of services in the 1990s taking forward themes, established in the 1980s, of integration into the work force and the active commitment of employers to good practices in creating employment opportunities for people with disabilities. The document has been widely distributed and the period of consultation runs to 31 December.

62. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he intends to introduce to preserve and enforce the quota system for employment of people with disabilities.

Mr. Jackson: This Department's consultative document, "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities", invites comments on the merits and demerits of the quota system for employment of people with disabilities. Decisions on its future operation will be taken when we have considered the comments that we receive.

65. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to improve the legislative framework for the employment of people with disabilities.

Mr. Jackson: This Department's consultative document, "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities", invites comments on the merits and demerits of various legislative approaches to promoting the employment of people with disabilities. Decisions on the best way forward will be taken when we have considered the comments that we receive.

Training

28. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the total British work force attended formal training courses in 1989.

Mr. Forth: The information is not available in the form requested.

42. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any proposals to oblige every company to set up a training body with guaranteed trade union representation at every workplace.

Mr. Forth: There are no such plans. The most effective incentive for companies to train is a knowledge and understanding of their skill needs, not centralised regulation.

49. Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last met his opposite numbers in Germany, France and Italy to discuss training.

Mr. Howard: This year I have visited West Germany and Italy to discuss training issues with my opposite numbers. When I attended the EC Labour and Social Affairs Council of Ministers in May and an informal meeting of this Council in Italy on 12 July, at which training was discussed, I met my counterparts from these and other EC member states.

Labour Mobility

30. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the early indications of greater labour mobility between European Community member states; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: There are no reliable estimates of labour mobility between European Community member states.

Technical and Vocational Education Initiative

31. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received from organisations in Lancashire on his plans for the technical and vocational education initiative extension programme.

Mr. Jackson: Lancashire is being funded to start its extension programme this autumn. There have been several representations seeking more funds in the first year of the programme. The Department is reassuring the education authority, schools and colleges that Lancashire will be getting its full share of funds over the life of the programme.

52. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his proposals for the technical and vocational education initiative for the next three years.

Mr. Jackson: By September 1990, 103 education authorities will be in their five-year extension phase of TVEI. The remaining 29 authorities will come into extension when resources permit, provided the authorities' plans meet the appropriate standards. The total budget available for TVEI in 1990-91 is £134 million. Planned expenditure for 1991-92 and 1992-93 is £133 million and £141 million respectively. The total cost of the extension phase will be about £900 million as envisaged in 1986 when TVEI extension was announced.

67. Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his policy on the development and financing of the technical and vocational education initiative.

Mr. Jackson: TVEI brings important benefits to pupils and employers and contributes to improving the nation's skill supply. The Government therefore aim to extend TVEI to all 14 to 18-year-olds in maintained schools and colleges and are providing £900 million for this purpose. In each local authority TVEI extension funding is spread over five years and by this autumn 103 authorities will have started their extension phase.

Secondary Picketing

32. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any plans to reintroduce the right to carry out mass secondary picketing.

Mr. Forth: There are no such plans.

Mines (Safety)

33. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has considered external legal advice in regard to proposed changes in the regulation of safety in mines.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Commission would submit regulatory proposals to Ministers only if it was satisfied on legal advice from its solicitor that they were legally sound.

Footballers (YTS)

34. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many members of the England football team in the world cup competition had received football training under YTS.

Mr. Howard: Two members of the England football team—Paul Gascoigne and David Platt—have received football training under YTS.

38. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last met a professional footballer who had received football training under YTS.

Mr. Howard: I met Paul Gascoigne in Naples during the quarter-finals of the world cup on 1 July.

45. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the football training made available under YTS in recent years.

Mr. Howard: Football training has been provided under YTS and now under youth training since the introduction of YTS in 1983. All 92 Football League clubs are involved in youth training.

The effectiveness of the training is evident from the substantial number of ex-trainees now playing regular first team football at clubs throughout the four divisions of the Football League and at international level. The last four young players of the year, including this year's winner, Matthew Le Tissier, were trained on YTS, as were Paul Gascoigne and David Platt, who excelled in England's world cup team in Italy this year.

Health and Safety Executive

35. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how he intends to improve the work of the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Commission's plan of work for 1990-91 and beyond sets out the priorities of the commission and executive for this and the next two years. The plan will be published in July.

Employee Involvement

41. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to help encourage further the degree of employee involvement among British companies.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. and learned Friend takes every opportunity to emphasise the importance of effective employee involvement. The Department promotes and supports its development through research and by publicising best practice, as in our booklet "People and Companies".

Wages Councils

43. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he proposes to introduce to improve the working of the wages councils.

Mr. Forth: The councils are empowered to set minimum rates of pay in certain industries. Checks by wages inspectors show that compliance with wages council orders is running at a very high level.

Sheltered Placement Scheme

46. Mrs. Heal: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future funding arrangements for the sheltered placement scheme.

Mr. Jackson: Proposals for a rebalancing of the sheltered employment programme over a transitional period of five years, in favour of sheltered placements, are contained in the consultative document "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities" which was published on 29 June. Views are invited on the existing funding arrangements and possible cost-effective improvements to them which could be met within existing resources. Interested parties have until 31 December to comment.

Agriculture (Accidents)

50. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he intends to introduce to prevent deaths due to agricultural work.

Mr. Forth: No legislative proposals are planned. However, the Health and Safety Executive will continue with its programme of strategies aimed at helping the agricultural industry to achieve reductions in fatal accident levels. These include: targeting inspection at those workplaces that present the greatest risk to employees, the self-employed, their families and the general public including children, carrying out advisory and publicity work to promote an increased awareness of health and safety in the industry, and liaising with all sides of industry to improve the health and safety aspects of products.

In seeking compliance with health and safety legislation, inspectors will also use innovative inspection techniques including blitz initiatives targeted at specific farming operations. They will also pay more attention to the management of health and safety.

Inspectors will pursue their inquiries and any enforcement action to the highest levels at workplaces which do not measure up to the standards expected of them.

63. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he intends to introduce to prevent accidents and fatalities as a result of agricultural work.

Mr. Forth: No legislative proposals are planned. However, the Health and Safety Executive will continue with its programme of strategies aimed at helping the agricultural industry to achieve reductions in the numbers of non-fatal and fatal accidents. These include: targeting inspection at those workplaces that present the greatest risk to employees, the self-employed, their families and the general public including children, carrying out advisory and publicity work to promote an increased awareness of health and safety in the industry, and liaising with all sides of industry to improve the health and safety aspects of products.

In seeking compliance with health and safety legislation, inspectors will also use innovative inspection techniques including blitz initiatives targeted at specific farming operations. They will also pay more attention to the management of health and safety.

Inspectors will pursue their inquiries and any enforcement action to the highest levels at workplaces which do not measure up to the standards expected of them.

Employee Rehabilitation Centre, Cardiff

53. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has for the provision after 1993 of the services of the employee rehabilitation centre, Western avenue, Cardiff.

Mr. Jackson: Plans for the provision after 1993 of the services of the employment rehabilitation centre, Western avenue, Cardiff, have yet to be made. The South Glamorgan committee for the employment of disabled people will be consulted in drawing up any such plans.

Minimum Wage

54. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the effects on employment of the introduction of a minimum wage requirement at the level of half median male earnings.

Mr. Forth: Officials in the Department have estimated that the introduction of a minimum wage set at half median male earnings would result in the loss of about three quarters of a million jobs.

EPCOT

55. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to pay an official visit to the British showcase at EPCOT in Florida.

Mr. Howard: I have no plans to make an official visit to the British showcase in Florida.

Astra Training Services Ltd.

56. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many freehold sites have been sold to Astra Training Services Ltd.; what is the total anticipated revenue; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The sale of training businesses at 45 skill centres plus the STA head office, mobile training service, sales teams and colleges to Astra Training Services Ltd. included the acquisition by Astra of 28 freehold sites. These sites formed part of the overall sale package, which involved a payment from the Government to Astra of some £10·7 million.

Confederation of British Industry

59. Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he plans to meet the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the estimated size and skills knowledge of the labour force for the rest of the decade; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. and learned Friend meets the CBI from time to time to discuss a wide range of labour market issues. These include the importance of determining the future training needs of the work force and how best employers can meet these needs in the light of demographic trends forecast for the next 10 years.

Low Pay

60. Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on low pay.

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Member to the Minister of State's reply to the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) on 22 May 1990 at column 157.

Industrial Action

61. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many working days have been lost over the last two years through unofficial industrial action; and what proportion this constitutes of the total number of days lost through industrial action.

Mr. Forth: A special exercise has shown that in 1988 approximately 1·3 million working days were lost through unofficial stoppages, about one third of the total for the year. The analysis is not available for 1989.

Youth Training

64. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the recontracting process for youth training.

Mr. Jackson: The youth training recontracting process has been managed successfully and 98 per cent. of providers have agreed new contracts.

Tourism

70. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what action he has taken to improve standards in the small hotel and guest house sector.

Mr. Forth: The English tourist board operates the "Crown" classification and grading scheme for serviced accommodation. One of the main objectives of the scheme is to improve the quality and range of services and facilities offered to the customer. About 11,000 establishments in England are already participating in it and more are joining all the time. Over half of the participants have applied for a commendation for quality, a new optional feature of the scheme.

Health and Safety Commission

72. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last met members of the Health and Safety Commission; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) on 29 June 1990 at column 342.

Creche Facilities

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many firms operating in Scotland currently provide creche facilities for their employees' children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: This information is not collected.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Forth: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures and through specific programmes of support and assistance. The success of their policies is demonstrated by the latest statistics which show a record increase in the number of businesses registered for VAT, of around 1,700 a week during 1989. Over the decade the overall increase has been 373,000.

Measures operated by my Department to assist small businesses include: the small firms service, which is operated by the Training Agency of the Department, and provides information and business counselling to new and established businesses. It was a record year for the service, which carried out more counselling, more work with growing firms, and answered more inquiries during 1989-90, than ever before. In the last financial year, the service answered over 317,000 inquiries (an increase of 12·9 per cent. on 1988-89), handled over 36,000 counselling sessions (an increase of 17·7 per cent. on 1988-89), and conducted over 36,000 counselling cases (an increase of 20·4 per cent. on 1988-89).

Business growth training was introduced in 1989 to provide help to established firms to develop their business and management skills. It has already proved to be a highly successful scheme, with over 122,000 owner managers assisted to date.

My Department also provides financial assistance through the enterprise allowance scheme and makes substantial grants available to Business in the Community, local enterprise agencies and the Prince's Youth Business Trust amongst others. To take the enterprise allowance scheme as an example, it has been a great encouragement to unemployed people to go into self-employment. In the period 1989-90 over 78,000 have participated in the scheme. Since the start in 1983 over 500,000 people have taken advantage of the scheme.

The enterprise training element of employment training and the business enterprise programme help people set up in business through the provision of targeted training in all the basic aspects of business. The combined number of entrants to these programmes increased from 43,489 in 1987-88 to 59,480 in 1989-90. In addition, the graduate enterprise programme helps graduates take the first steps to setting up businesses on their own. The number of entrants to this programme rose to 1,184 in 1989-90.

Assistance of this type for the self-employed and small firms will in future be provided locally by training and enterprise councils. TECs will have the opportunity to tailor assistance to local circumstances.

The loan guarantee scheme continues to enhance smaller firms' access to finance. In the 12 months to 30 June 1990, 3,450 loans were guaranteed representing total lending of £104 million. Usage during the year remained buoyant with applications averaging 285 a month compared with 200 a month in the previous year, and 120 a month two years ago.

Over the past year I have continued my campaign to improve the access of small firms to Government contracts. My Department has published and distributed booklets designed for both Government purchasers and small firms which identify purchasing needs, departmental contacts and give guidance on improving Government purchasing procedures. I have also appointed a purchasing consultant to improve the systems by which small firms can get better access to public contracts. My Department publicises its own contracts and has produced a departmental guide for those companies that want to tender, including small firms. We have encouraged managers to use local small firms in devolving the purchasing function and budgets where appropriate.

My Department has continued with action to reduce burdens on business; through the Employment Act 1989, for example, the procedures for taking on women and young people have been simplified. We have also produced a range of advice and guidance for smaller companies, including the well-received self-employment starter pack. As well as maintaining a close interest in domestic deregulation, we are working hard to ensure that the EC's social charter does not impose unnecessary burdens, with the circumstances of small businesses very much in mind.

The Department monitors all its programmes and also commissions external evaluations which are published. In December 1989 we published an overview, "Small Firms in Britain", a copy of which is in the Library. The report surveys developments in the sector, includes key statistical indicators and outlines Government policy and measures as a whole towards small firms.

Flame-retardant Fabrics

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what evidence he has that workers in the upholstery and bedding industry are experiencing health problems as a result of the materials used in the manufacture of flame-retardant covers and treated fabrics;

(2) whether the Health and Safety Executive has had discussions with the Furniture, Timber and Allied Trades Union regarding the materials used in the manufacture of flame-retardant covers and treated fabrics;

(3) if he will ask the Health and Safety Executive to carry out an investigation into (a) the abrasive effect of coated fabrics upon hands and arms and (b) nose and throat irritation from dipped and sprayed fabrics experienced by employees in the manufacture of flame-retardant covers and treated fabrics in the upholstery and bedding industry.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive is already investigating evidence that flame-retardant and crease-resistant finishes applied to textile fabrics may result in skin, nose and throat irritation in workers handling those fabrics in the upholstery and bedding industries, and has been discussing the problem with the Furniture, Timber and Allied Trades Union.

European Social Fund

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he will forward plans submitted to his Department from voluntary sector projects to the European social fund for approval.

Mr. Forth: Operational programmes, which represent aggregated bids from all interested organisations, including those representing the voluntary sector, were submitted to the European Commission on 15 June. No individual project applications have as yet been made by the voluntary sector.

Maternity Pay

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to harmonise female employees' entitlement to maternity leave related to pay with the practice in other countries in the European Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. and learned Friend has no such plans. The Government believe that member states should be free to make their own arrangements for maternity, in accordance with national traditions and practices.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will lift the present restriction whereby female employees are entitled to claim maternity benefit only when they have worked for the same employer for two or more years; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have been asked to reply.

No such restriction exists. Statutory maternity pay (SMP) is payable for 18 weeks to women who have worked for the same employer for at least 26 weeks at the qualifying week (the 15th week before the baby is due). Where a woman with a recent employment record has worked for her current employer for fewer than 26 weeks she will normally qualify for maternity allowance from the Department of Social Security instead of SMP from her employer.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many suspected cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy have been reported since the start of the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The number of suspect cases placed under restrictions each week is as follows:

Week ending	Number
5 January 1990	245
12 January 1990	293
19 January 1990	283
26 January 1990	294
2 February 1990	309
9 February 1990	329
16 February 1990	361
23 February 1990	369
2 March 1990	424
9 March 1990	392
16 March 1990	402
23 March 1990	354
30 March 1990	334
6 April 1990	328
13 April 1990	295
20 April 1990	274
27 April 1990	303
4 May 1990	349
11 May 1990	338
18 May 1990	399
25 May 1990	365
1 June 1990	353
8 June 1990	362

Week ending	Number
15 June 1990	247
22 June 1990	291
29 June 1990	262
6 July 1990	219
13 July 1990	206

The pattern of suspect cases reported this year has so far followed closely the trend that occurred in 1989, in which an increase in cases during January and February was followed by an overall decrease during the spring months, albeit with fluctuations.

Whilst there has been an underlying decrease in the numbers reported in the last few months compared to the high point in February/March, this has been subject to marked fluctuations and it cannot be assumed that this trend will continue.

Agricultural Prices

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will describe the net effects on supply estimates of the European Community decisions on agricultural prices for 1990-91.

Mr. Gummer: The voted provision for class III vote 1 for the intervention board executive agency (CAP market support) is a token of £1,000 due to the forecasts of receipts exceeding expenditure. The cost of the price-fixing decisions in the United Kingdom in 1990-91 has been estimated at £125 million. This relates mainly to the devaluation of the green pound and to reductions in the payment period for intervention intake. These measures, together with changes in market conditions which have arisen since the supply estimates were published, are expected to result both in increased expenditure and receipts. The necessary changes will be sought through a winter supplementary estimate.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Ministry in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have continued to place high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures and through specific programmes of support and assistance.

The Department has continued to contribute significantly to this process. We have maintained pressure for a more market-oriented common agricultural policy, and the 1990 price-fixing agreement consolidated the progress made last year. These achievements, together with the reforms to systems of agricultural support worldwide being negotiated in the current GATT round, will further encourage a competitive and efficient agricultural industry, well placed to compete with its counterparts in other Community countries.

We have also continued to make available to farmers a range of income-generating schemes—for example the farm woodlands scheme, set-aside, the farm diversification grant scheme and the environmentally sensitive areas scheme—designed to encourage them to diversify their enterprises, as well as provide opportunities to enhance the environment. We have recently launched pilot schemes to encourage more extensive farming of beef cattle and sheep.

All the schemes operated by my Department are closely monitored. Reports on particular schemes are published from time to time.

Plankton Recorder Programme

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in re-establishing the continuous plankton recorder programme.

Mr. Maclean: Following the withdrawal of direct funding by the Natural Environment Research Council from the continuous plankton recorder survey, the Ministry has renewed its contract with NERC for £150,000 per annum for a further two years to safeguard the Ministry's interests in this survey as a source of valuable information relevant to our fisheries and environmental protection interests.

The Ministry has successfully persuaded the international scientific community of the value of maintaining such environmental monitoring programmes and took the lead in promoting an international funding trust to secure the future of this survey. I am pleased to report that the international response has been sufficient to enable the trust to be established so that the survey will continue. The constitution of the trust is currently being drafted.

Aspartame

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether the Food Advisory Committee considered (a) summary or (b) full data when it approved the use of aspartame; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will place the data considered by the Food Advisory Committee on aspartame in the Library.

Mr. Gummer: The data on aspartame considered by the Food Additives and Contaminants Committee (FAC) (the predecessor of the Food Advisory Committee) comprised the case of need and a report from the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment, containing its considered advice on the safety of the sweetener. This is contained in the FAC report on the review of sweeteners in food (FAC/REP/34). Copies of this report are already lodged in the Library.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place a copy of the agreements between his Ministry and food companies, and advice given by his Ministry, relating to the labelling of products containing aspartame, in the Library.

Mr. Gummer: It is a statutory requirement to declare aspartame in ingredients lists under the Food Labelling Regulations 1984 (S.I. 1984 No. 1305). My Ministry has issued no further advice on this matter nor does it have any agreements with food companies about aspartame.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will now ask his Food Advisory Committee to urgently review aspartame; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Both the Food Advisory Committee and the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment are currently reviewing the use of all sweeteners in food. I anticipate receiving their full report and recommendations early next year but in the meantime they will inform me if they see the need for any action earlier.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has received from the United States Food and Drug Administration concerning the safety of aspartame ; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: My officials have received information on the safety of aspartame from a number of sources including those originating in the United States of America. This information, together with new data produced and collected since aspartame was approved in this country seven years ago, is currently being considered by the independent Committee on the Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment (COT).

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce a compulsory health warning on products containing aspartame; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The use of aspartame in a food product will appear in the ingredients list. There is no general health hazard arising from the use of this sweetener; the small number of people who suffer from phenylkentonuria and should therefore not ingest aspartame have access to advice from their doctors to avoid products containing it.

Food Irradiation

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to lay the regulations under the Food Safety Act 1990 that will control the process of food irradiation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The first essential step is to arrange for consultations to take place on our proposals. Only when these have been completed and the results assessed will regulations be laid.

Active Ingredients

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the active ingredients which have been approved since 3 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: There is no provision in food law for the approval of "active ingredients"; this is a concept confined to medicines legislation.

Pesticides

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the pesticides which have been approved since 3 April, indicating whether it was a full or partial review in each case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The following approvals for agricultural pesticide products have been issued by my Department since 3 April:

	Number
Experimental permits	21
Full or provisional approvals	98
Off-label approvals	11

of which:

	Number of products	Approvals
New active ingredients
Fenpropathrin	1	A provisional approval and an experimental permit
Paclobutrazol	4	Provisional approvals
Reviewed active ingredient
Alachlor (full review)	1	Provisional approval extended for one year

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Employment is responsible for the approval and review of non-agricultural pesticides.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list in the Official Report details of work he is sponsoring on pesticide effects on shepherds.

Mr. Gummer: All suspected adverse reactions reported by shepherds and others to licensed sheep dips are investigated under Medicines Act procedures. The findings will be fully taken into account as part of the review of ectoparasiticide products to ensure that modern standards on safety, quality and efficacy are being met. The review is expected to have been completed early in 1992.

Richard Kimberlin

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields on 26 June, Official Report, column 204, if he will list the amount of money paid to Mr. Richard Kimberlin for each year he has provided expert advice; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The Department has paid the following fees and expenses to Dr. Kimberlin for consultancy work commissioned with him:

1989	4,279·00
1990	3,128·34

Sheep Dip

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with the National Rivers Authority about the emptying of sheep dips; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Sheep dip emptying has not been the focus of recent discussions with the National Rivers Authority, as last year sheep dips gave rise to only 13 out of 2,889 agricultural water pollution incidents. Nevertheless the guidance available on disposal is currently being reviewed to see how this can best be improved.

Sugar Substitutes

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce a compulsory health warning on Sweet and Low saccharine granulated sugar substitutes along the lines of that used in the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I have no plans to do so. Saccharin has been cleared as safe by the independent expert advisory committees. At my request the committees have, however, recently reviewed saccharin. I expect to receive their recommendations very shortly when I can consider whether any further action is necessary.

SCOTLAND

Community Care

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to implement the new arrangements for community care; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I refer to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) on 18 July 1990.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the cost in staff time and resources within the Scottish Office of working to prepare for the implementation of the community care reforms.

Mr. Lang: Some 25 officials within the Scottish Office have devoted a significant proportion of their working time within the past eight months to preparations for the implementation of the arrangements announced in the White Paper published in November 1989. This work has included preparing advice for Ministers on the content of legislation and other matters, drafting guidance documents for consultation purposes and taking forward discussions with local authority and voluntary sector interests. All this work would have been necessary regardless of the particular timetable chosen for implementing the proposals. The amount of time expended by individual officials has varied considerably and accurate calculations of the total cost could not be produced without disproportionate expenditure.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland exactly how much extra funding Scottish local authorities have been calculated to require to implement the community care reforms; whether this can be broken down into region-by-region figures for Scotland; and what are the calculations of need and precise method used to arrive at these figures.

Mr. Lang: The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities provided estimates of the additional costs involved for Scottish local authorities in total in implementing the proposals in the White Paper "Caring for People". Officials of my Department have discussed these with representatives of the convention and further discussions will take place in the light of the phased implementation plan.

My right hon. and learned Friend will have regard to the financial implications of community care in announcing the local authority settlement later this week.

Disabled People

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what representations he has received from voluntary organisations in Scotland concerning the implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what consultations he has had with health authorities in Scotland concerning the regulations to be made under section 2(7) of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 in order to extend the rights of authorised representatives; and if he will make a statement;

(3) when he intends to lay an order to bring into force section 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what monitoring his Department carries out as to whether local authorities in Scotland are fulfilling their duties under the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(5) what consultations he has had with voluntary organisations in Scotland concerning the regulations to be made under section 1 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(6) what information he has laid before Parliament under section 11 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(7) what research he has undertaken on the implementation by local authorities in Scotland of sections 4, 8, 9, 10 and 13 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(8) when he intends to lay an order to bring into force sections 1 and 2 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(9) what consultations he is having with local authority associations in Scotland concerning the implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(10) what consultations he has had with local authority associations in Scotland concerning the regulations to be made under section 2(7) of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 in order to extend the rights of authorised representatives; and if he will make a statement;

(11) what plans he has for consulting upon and implementing sections 1, 2, 3 and 7 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will produce a simple guide to these sections shortly thereafter.

Mr. Lang: Sections 4, 8(1) and 9 to 14 of the Act have already been implemented. Progress on implementing the remaining provisions is dependent on the availability of resources and no consultations have been held about implementation of further provisions. I have received representations from the care in the community Scottish working group on the implementation of sections 1 and 2.

The first report to be laid before Parliament under the Act—"Care of Persons with a Mental Handicap or Mental Illness in Scotland"—is at present being printed. Scottish Office officials have met the Association of Directors of Social Work to discuss local authority progress in implementing section 13 of the Act and the need for further guidance. We will be considering what further monitoring arrangements are required.

Dentures

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of persons who had (a) full and (b) partial national health service dentures made in the periods (i) April 1988 to April 1989 and (ii) April 1989 to April 1990.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Financial year figures are not available centrally. Calendar year figures are set out in the table:

	Number
1988
Full dentures	104,830
Partial dentures	67,956
1989
Full dentures	95,529
Partial dentures	86,013

Hearing Impairment

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which Scottish universities and institutes of higher education make special provision for students with hearing impairments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: This information is not available. It is for the universities and other institutions themselves to decide what special arrangements should be made for students with hearing impairments.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provision has been made within mainstream primary and secondary state schools in Scotland in the five years ended June 1990 to assist children with hearing impairments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: Education authorities are responsible for ensuring that sufficient specialist assistance is provided for all children with special educational needs.

As for provision in mainstream schools for pupils with hearing impairment, individual authorities adopt varying approaches. Most children are taught by class teachers supported by visiting specialist teachers. Some authorities also have units for the hearing impaired housed in primary and secondary schools, although the bulk of the pupils' time is still spent in the mainstream class. Most children are taught using either the oral-aural approach or the total communication method, with the former more commonly used in the mainstream setting.

Social Security

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much will be transferred from the Department of Social Security to Scottish local authorities for their new responsibilities; whether this can be broken down region by region for Scotland; and how these figures are calculated.

Mr. Lang: The amount of the proposed transfer of resources from the Department of Social Security to Scottish local authorities has not been determined yet. As indicated in the written reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) on 18 July, the first transfer of such funds is now planned for 1993-94.

Self-governing Schools

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all those schools which have expressed an interest in opting out.

Mr. Lang: Parents at Holm primary school in Orkney have presented the school board with a formal request seeking a ballot on self-governing status.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many redundancies there were in the Borders region for every year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: There are no comprehensive statistics on redundancies. Information on the number of redundancies involving 10 or more workers confirmed to the Department of Employment as having occurred in the Borders region between 1979 and June 1990 is set out in the table.

Confirmed redundancies

[2] January to June.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the unemployment levels for each Scottish region in October for every year since 1979.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The tables provide the available information. For the period 1979 to 1982 data are available only on the number of registrants at jobcentres. From 1983 the available information is for unemployed claimants. Comparisons over time are affected by the various changes in coverage and in particular by the discontinuity between 1982 and 1983.

Community Charge

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further changes he proposes to make to alleviate the impact of the community charge on poorer families and pensioners.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The community charge benefit scheme is already helping those on lower incomes. This scheme is much more generous than the former rates rebate scheme and over 1 million people in Scotland are paying a reduced community charge as a result. The extension of the community charge relief scheme which my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland announced on 19 July means that many more former ratepayers, pensioners and disabled people will receive help with their bills and over a longer period.

Mackinnon Memorial Hospital, Skye

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total number of (a) major and (b) intermediate surgical operations performed at the Mackinnon memorial hospital in Skye in 1988 and 1989, respectively.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There is no generally recognised classification of operations into major and intermediate and information is not held centrally in this manner. The total number of cases operated on in Mackinnon memorial hospital in 1988 and 1989 were 734 and 733 respectively.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the accurancy of the 1990 declarations made by Scottish fishing vessels as to catches of cod made in or attributed to area VII; and what steps are taken to ensure that arrangements for the accurate declaration in log books of fish catches in area VII are being complied with.

Mr. Lang: Landings by Scottish fishing vessels of cod recorded as having been caught in International Council for the Exploration of the Seas area VII are being investigated and currently six cases are being prepared for submission to the prosecuting authorities. Inquiries are continuing in respect of a number of additional cases where some evidence of misreporting exists.

Log books are examined when fishing vessels are boarded and at the end of each fishing trip when a copy of the log book pages are handed in to the local fishery office. Checks are made to ensure that the entries are compatible with the catch on board or landed and are consistent with any sightings of the vessel while it was at sea.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will name the Scottish fishing vessels which claim to have entered area VII and caught cod fish since 1 January; and if he will list separately those which were (a) at the limit of their quota or (b) had not filled their quota for cod fishing in areas VIa or IV.

Mr. Lang: No. It would not be appropriate to name individual vessels in the manner requested. Under the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984 information about an individual data subject cannot be disclosed, except in a limited number of circumstances, without that subject's consent.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements exist for identifying the names of fishing vessels that use the Caledonian canal from either east to west or west to east.

Mr. Lang: All vessels which pass through the Caledonian canal are logged by the canal office of the British Waterways Board.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will set up an inquiry into misdeclaration by Scottish fishing vessels of cod catches since January.

Mr. Lang: The circumstances which have given rise to allegations of misreporting of cod catches by Scottish fishing vessels are being investigated.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland officials have (a) witnessed fishing vessels either registered or based at Scottish ports enter into area VII or leave area VII either in anticipation of a catch or with a catch on board and (b) sighted Scottish fishing vessels within area VII.

Mr. Lang: The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland is responsible for patrolling only that part of ICES area VII which is adjacent to the south-west coast of Scotland. Aerial surveillance during April, May and June 1990 identified six Scottish fishing vessels in that area.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions Scottish fishing vessels have entered into area VII since 1 January.

Mr. Lang: The information on entry to ICES area VII is not available in the form requested. However, records show that Scottish vessels which landed fish (of all species) into Scotland from ICES area VII have made a total of 446 trips to that area since 1 January 1990. Many Scottish fishermen traditionally fish area VII.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state which fishing vessels reported to DAFS at Scrabster their movements (a) in a westerly direction across the 4 deg W line since 1 January and (b) in an easterly direction across the 4 deg W line since 1 January.

Mr. Lang: It is assumed that the question relates to vessels making radio reports to the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland. These reports were made to Ullapool or Aberdeen rather than to Scrabster. A total of 1,649 reports were received in the period 1 January to 30 June 1990. Of these, 887 were from vessels proceeding east to west, 731 from west to east and 31 from vessels fishing close to the 4 deg W line.

In the same period 24 vessels which were unable to make radio reports called in to Scrabster voluntarily. Of these 15 were heading west and nine were heading east.

The large number of vessels involved precludes listing them individually.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what catches were recorded by Scottish vessels from ICES area VIId, VIIb and VIIc in June.

Mr. Lang: Landings into Scotland by Scottish vessels during June for ICES areas VIIb and VIIc were as follows. No landings from area VIId were recorded in June by Scottish vessels.

Species	Area VIIb [1] Tonnes landed	Area VIIc [1] Tonnes landed
Cod	135	1
Haddock	24	20

[1] Rounded to the nearest tonne.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the incidence of calling in in respect of Scottish vessels landing at each Scottish port in June 1989 and June 1990 broken down by length of vessel.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 23 July 1990]: It is assumed that the question refers to calling in vessels for inspection, when crossing the 4 deg line. No vessels were called into port for physical inspection in either June 1989 or June 1990.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many Scottish vessels landing area VII catches at Peterhead failed to radio in;

(2) what was the average number of days at sea per trip recorded for June in respect of Scottish vessels landing at Peterhead having declared fishing in sea area VII;

(3) how many Scottish vessels landing area VII catches at Peterhead in June had radioed in; and what percentage were physically summoned for inspection.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 23 July 1990]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) on 20 July.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will order a full investigation into the effectiveness of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland monitoring of fish landings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 23 July 1990]: As I have already indicated to the hon. Member, urgent consideration is being given to fisheries enforcement procedures, in the light of recent developments.

Student Awards

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many students in each Scottish local authority area received (a) mandatory awards and (b) discretionary awards in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Lang: The information is not available in the form requested.

Awards under the students' allowances scheme—broadly equivalent to mandatory awards—are administered centrally and do not distinguish between individual local authority areas. The total number of such awards offered to Scottish domiciled students in session 1989-90 was 65,825.

Discretionary awards for students attending other full-time courses of further or higher education are the responsibility of individual education authorities under the Education Authority Bursaries (Scotland) Regulations 1988, as amended. Information on these awards is not held centrally.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Lang: Small firms continue to play an important and dynamic role in the regeneration of the Scottish economy. Small firms also continue to benefit from the comprehensive schemes of support that the Government have introduced. In the main, these are delivered through the Scottish Development Agency, the Highlands and Islands Development Board and the Industry Department for Scotland, where policy responsibility lies. In addition to providing services specific to Scotland, the SDA, HIDB and the Industry Department for Scotland are responsible for the delivery and monitoring in Scotland of United Kingdom services on behalf of other Departments, including the Department of Employment and the Department of Trade and Industry. During 1989, there was a net increase of over 4,500 or 4·2 per cent. in the number of companies registered for VAT in Scotland. This is double the increase of the previous year. VAT returns indicate that between 1980 and 1989 the number of new businesses operating in Scotland showed a net increase of 19,900.

The following describes the services available to small firms in Scotland during the periods 1988-89 and 1989-90 and some of their achievements.

For the period 1988-89 IDS made 128 offers of regional selective assistance to the value of £12 million to small companies—those employing fewer than 200 people worldwide—in Scotland. This contributed to the creation of 2,180 new jobs and the safeguarding of 560 existing jobs. In 1989-90 167 offers of RSA were made to the value of over £17 million which contributed to the creation of 3,080 new jobs and the safeguarding of 340 existing jobs. For the period 1988-89 IDS made 2,180 offers to the value of £70 million under the revised regional development grants scheme to proposed projects by small companies in Scotland with the potential for 20,980 new jobs. In 1989-90 236 offers of RDG were made to the value of over £12 million with the potential for 3,400 new jobs. The last date for applications under this scheme was 31 March 1988. Information on the grant offered to small firms under the original RDG scheme is not available. Under both the investment and innovation elements of the regional enterprise grants scheme, 226 offers to the value of £2 million were made in Scotland in 1988-89, to companies employing under 25 people, contributing to the creation of 490 new jobs and the safeguarding of 400 existing jobs. In 1989-90 432 offers of REG to the value of over £4 million were made contributing to the creation of 1,640 new jobs and the safeguarding of 1,660 existing jobs.

During the periods in question, the better business service scheme was administered by IDS, SDA and the HIDB. The scheme allows small companies to have access to subsidised professional business advice and in 1988-89 some 6,804 offers of assistance were made with an associated value of £3·1 million. In 1989-90 some 8,090 offers of assistance were made with an associated value of £3·7 million.

Scottish Development Agency support for small businesses includes the provision of financial assistance, premises and a wide range of advisory services, including the small firms service (SFS) in Scotland and the administration of DTI's consultancy initiatives, under the enterprise initiative. In addition, the SFS offers an integrated and complementary range of business services including a Government business shop, a Euroinfocentre, a franchise desk and a Companies House satellite office. Under the consultancy initiatives, some 1,235 consultancy projects were undertaken during 1988-89 and in 1989-90 this figure was 1,158. In the year 1988-89, the agency had contact with 19,250 small firms and some £1·8 million was invested in 92 small firms creating or safeguarding 1,600 jobs. In 1989-90 the small firms service handled 17,286 inquiries; figures for SFS investment are not yet available, but across all sectors in Scotland the SDA invested £7 million and safeguarded 6,091 jobs.

As well as delivering a small firms counselling service in its area, the Highlands and Islands Development Board undertakes a wide range of activities in support of businesses, most of which are small, to help them overcome the difficulties in operating in this peripheral and rural part of the United Kingdom. The measures taken include financial support to business, provision of factories and assistance with business advice and training. In 1988-89, the board approved 1,220 offers of financial assistance worth £25·3 million on projects involving proposed private sector investment of some £44·4 million and the creation or safeguarding of 3,300 jobs. For the period 1989-90, the board approved 983 offers of financial assistance worth £19·4 million on projects involving proposed private sector investment of £51·1 million and the creation or safeguarding of 2,700 jobs. In the period 1988-89, the HIDB completed 12,553 sq m of factory floor space. In this period some 3,130 jobs were housed in HIDB factories. In the period 1989-90, the HIDB completed 7,208 sq m of factory floor space. In this period, some 3,200 jobs were housed in HIDB factories.

Local enterprise trusts have proved to be an important catalyst in fostering the enterprise culture in Scotland. The Government have continued to demonstrate their recognition of the valuable role played by the trusts, and the SDA provided financial support of £1·24 million to the 40 enterprise trusts in 1988-89, the latest year for which figures are available—an increase of almost 21 per cent. over the previous year. This has triggered a further £4·23 million from the other public and private sector partners. During 1988-89 trusts in Scotland counselled 25,200 clients from which 3,900 small businesses were formed. Companies assisted by enterprise trusts created some 9,000 new jobs. The SDA bases its financial assistance on its appraisal of each trust's annual management plan which contains details of the previous year's projects and objectives for the oncoming year.

The Scottish Office continues to provide wholehearted support for the deregulation initiative. Recent steps which have been taken to embed further the deregulation message within Scottish Office Departments include arrangements for deregulation awareness training, a ministerial message on deregulation, a staff competition for deregulatory suggestions and the inclusion of advice on the topic in the Scottish Office staff handbook. The Government business shop in Glasgow continues to provide a very effective single access point for information on how to deal with Government regulations.

As for public purchasing and supplier development, in the past year IDS, SDA and MOD have co-operated in the organisation of two seminars on civil and defence procurement. IDS made a strong contribution to a seminar organised by Strathclyde Innovation on improving the availability of development funding for small businesses. A major seminar was organised by IDS/SDA in October 1989 on the subject of supplier development. Another such event, focusing more closely on import substitution is planned for the latter half of 1990.

Eye Tests

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the numbers of senior citizens who received national health service eye tests during the periods (a) April 1988-89 and (b) April 1989-90.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not available centrally.

Low Incomes

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will accept the recommendations made to him by COSLA concerning those on low incomes and the effects of the community charge; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is at present considering the various recommendations made to him recently by COSLA. Some of these fall within the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security whom we will be consulting before we respond to COSLA.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), Official Report, 5 June, column 497 (a) on what date Dr. W. B. Martin became director of the Moredun research institute and (b) what research projects into scrapie were initiated by the Moredun research institute while Dr. W. B. Martin was its director.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Dr. W. B. Martin took up appointment as director of the Moredun research institute on 1 July 1977. During the period of his directorship, studies on changes in the brain of sheep exposed to scrapie agents were initiated at the institute, together with a programme of field observation work.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what share incentives will be offered to employees and pensioners when the two Scottish electricity companies are privatised.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy has today announced details of the employee and pensioner share incentives to be made available when the electricity companies in England and Wales are offered for sale to the public. Although precise details of equivalent incentives in Scotland will not be determined until nearer the time when the two Scottish electricity companies are floated, I expect the special arrangements for both retired and existing employees of the Scottish electricity industry to be broadly in line with those on offer in England and Wales.

Cash Limits

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he proposes to make any changes to the cash limits for 1990-91 within his responsibility.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, I intend to change three of the cash limits within my responsibility as follows.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class XV, vote 21, will be increased by £800,000 from £128,790,000 to £129,590,000. This increase is needed to accommodate additional expenditure not foreseen last autumn including, in particular, increased accommodation charges and costs relating to the new NHS executive. This will be offset by savings on the cash limits for class XV, vote 3, which will be reduced by £600,000 from £142,816,000 to £142,216,000, and for class XV, vote 6, which will be reduced by £200,000 from £251,542,000 to £251,342,000. The increase will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

As a consequence of these changes and of the reallocation of expenditure within class XV, vote 21, the Scottish Office running costs limit will be increased by £990,000 from £220,964,000 to £221,954,000.

Pre-school Education

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the numbers of (a) children, (b) qualified staff and (c) full-time equivalent qualified staff in registered (i) pre-school nurseries and (ii) playgroups for each academic year from 1979-80 to 1988-89 in (1) Inverclyde, (2) Strathclyde and (3) Scotland as a whole.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 12 July 1990]: The readily available information is set out in the table:

	Children[1] in Nurseries	Places[2] in Playgroups	Fully Qualified[3] Staff
Scotland
1979-80	35,500	41,750	3,116

[1] Number of children attending local authority nursery schools and day nurseries.
[2] Number of children for which registered pre-school playgroups are registered and number of places in local authority pre-school playgroups.
[3] Full-time equivalent number of teachers, trained nurses, and care staff in local authority nursery schools and day nurseries.

Employment Training

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland for each of the Training Agency area offices in Scotland what is the percentage allocation of employment training funds to mainstream and non-mainstream groups; and what are the reasons for the relative proportions.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 17 July 1990]: The information is not available in the form requested. For Scotland as a whole about 13 per cent. of the employment training funding available for people starting employment training in 1990-91 following agreement of new contracts with training providers is for entrants from non-mainstream groups. The expenditure on all non-mainstream provision delivered in 1990-91 is likely to be somewhat higher, reflecting higher proportions of non-mainstream trainees at the start of the period.

Information at area office level is for internal management purposes only.

Needle Exchange Schemes

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the needle exchange schemes currently operating in each of the health board areas in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 23 July 1990]: Three health boards currently operate needle and syringe exchange schemes as follows:

Lothian health board

Needle and syringe exchange arrangements exist in the Muirhouse, Craigmillar and Leith areas of Edinburgh.

Greater Glasgow health board

Schemes are operating at Ruchill hospital, Glasgow and in the Castlemilk and Easterhouse areas of the city.

Argyll and Clyde health board

A mobile needle and syringe exchange scheme is currently operating in the Inverclyde area on a trial basis.

AIDS

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the cumulative totals on 31 December 1987, 30 June 1988, 31 December 1988, 30 June 1989, 31 December 1989 and 30 June 1990 of (a) people who have died with AIDS, (b) people with AIDS including those who have died and (c) HIV antibody positive persons in Scotland (i) by patient characteristic, (ii) in each of the health board areas and (iii) in total.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The cumulative totals for Scotland of (a) people who have died with AIDS, (b) people with AIDS including those who have died, and (c) people who have been identified and reported to the Communicable Diseases (Scotland) Unit as being HIV antibody positive on the dates shown are given in tables I, II and III respectively. The tables provide a breakdown by patient characteristic for Scotland as a whole. The figures of AIDS cases and deaths and of HIV antibody positive persons for particular health board areas are, in some cases, very low and as their publication, according to patient characteristic, may in consequence endanger medical confidentiality, geographical breakdowns are not produced.

Table I: people who have died with AIDS

[9] Includes 12 people of African origin and one person of Caribbean origin: also one person with possible exposure abroad.

Disabled People (Training)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he takes to ensure that, in accordance with the employment training equal opportunities code of practice, disabled people have equality of opportunity; and whether extra training costs resulting from a trainee's disability are met by the Government.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The Training Agency, through its approved training organisation process, ensures that all employment training providers have and follow an equal opportunities policy allowing easy access to appropriate training for disabled people. Additionally, disabled individuals can enter the programme without having to satisfy the normal eligibility conditions regarding length of unemployment.

In their contract dealings with the Training Agency, individual training managers negotiate and agree terms which take account of the costs of all training provided including the needs of disabled trainees.

Youth Training

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the areas in Scotland in which special measures to ease access to youth training announced in March have been set up, which include links between social work departments, hostels accommodating homeless young people, voluntary organisations and suitable training providers.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 23 July 1990]: As part of the new arrangements announced for youth training, all Training Agency area offices in Scotland have appointed guarantee liaison officers whose remit is to assist young people within the youth training guarantee group and to establish or reaffirm links with voluntary organisations, social work departments, careers and probation services, and the Department of Social Security; and to encourage training managers to establish close links with hostels for homeless young people.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 25 July 1990

PRIME MINISTER

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Strang: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to her oral reply to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), Official Report, 12 June, column 146, what is the acceptable ratio between the number of Soviet nuclear weapons and the number of the United Kingdom nuclear weapons necessary to provide a minimum nuclear deterrent.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom's nuclear deterrent is not based on any specific numerical correlation with Soviet nuclear weapons. Rather, it has long been United Kingdom policy to maintain only the minimum number of weapons necessary to deter aggression. In this respect the need to ensure that our nuclear deterrent remains effective against improving Soviet defences is of overriding importance when considering the size of our force.

Diego Garcia

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to her reply to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), Official Report, 9 July, column 36, if she will make a statement on the nature of the security contribution made to the United Kingdom by the British Indian Ocean territory defence facilities on Diego Garcia.

The Prime Minister: The joint United Kingdom-United States defence facilities on Diego Garcia make a vital contribution to the maintenance of peace and stability and to the protection of western interests in the area.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Strang: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list those occasions since 1 January on which she personally raised the issue of nuclear non-proliferation and the nuclear non-proliferation treaty with foreign Governments or Heads of State.

The Prime Minister: I have not personally had occasion to raise the subject of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty although we have frequent contacts with other interested parties at official level, and the matter was part of the final conclusion of the economic summit at Houston. Nevertheless, I have spoken in general terms about the future of proliferation to several people.

THE ARTS

British Library

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the planned use for the northern area of the British library site at St. Pancras.

Mr. Mellor: Any land at the British library site at St. Pancras which may ultimately be surplus to requirements will be sold. The area of land which will be surplus and the optimum timing and method of its disposal are still being examined.

TRANSPORT

Roll on/Roll off Ferries

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the result of the meeting of officials from several European countries in London on 24 July to discuss the application and timing of a higher standard of residual stability to existing roll on/roll off passenger ferries.

Mr. McLoughlin: Officials from the Department's marine directorate had a successful meeting with officials from Belgium, Denmark, France, West Germany, the Republic of Ireland, the Isle of Man, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain and Sweden.

The application and timing of a higher standard of residual stability to existing roll on/roll off passenger vessels was discussed. Officials are considering the very constructive and substantial comments made with the view to submitting further information to the next International Maritime Organisation meeting.

Stockport Council (Land Conveyance)

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 26 April, Official Report, column 264, if he will make a statement on the progress made on conveying land near the M63 from Stockport borough council to his Department.

Mr. Chope: The Treasury Solicitor is waiting to hear further from Stockport borough council in response to his requisitions on title.

M62

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much of the M62 has been subject to roadworks in each of the past two years, to date; what distance of the M62 has been subject to lane restrictions as a consequence; what roadworks are scheduled over each of the next two years; what distance will be subject to lane restrictions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: During the last two financial years 24 km of the 180 km of the M62 have been subject to major roadworks—13 km in 1988-89 and 11 km in 1989-90.

Lane closures have been necessary over a distance of 15 km and 14 km in both directions in each of the last two years. Next year (1991-92) 14·5 km of major roadworks are planned and this will involve lane closures over about 18 km in each direction. Works of this nature are essential if the network is to be kept in good condition.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about persistent congestion and delays to traffic using the M62 over the past year to date; what action he proposes to alleviate such congestion and delays; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Several complaints have been received about congestion and delays on the M62.

To reduce delays and congestion, routine work is carried out during off-peak periods during the day, at weekends or overnight. Considerable effort goes into the pre-planning of traffic management measures for major roadworks and once the work is under way we give every encouragement for the contractor to complete it as quickly as possible by offering substantial bonuses for early completion or charging for over-running.

When delays caused by major works are unavoidable every effort is made to give advance warning to the public.

Thames Craft (Safety)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to review the regulations governing look-outs on (a) pleasure boats and (b) non-pleasure boats using the Thames.

Mr. McLoughlin: The rules covering look-outs contained in the International Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1972 are not under review at the International Maritime Organisation (IMO). The Port of London Authority general directions for navigation that apply to all craft plying on the Thames were amended on 18 September 1989. Those amendments included a revision of the requirements for a look-out.

Fuel Trains, Port Talbot

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions during the last 12 and 24 months, respectively, loaded fuel trains have been stabled at Port Talbot station for more than two minutes.

Mr. Freeman: British Railways tell me that loaded fuel trains are not stabled, which implies being left for long periods, at Port Talbot station. They normally stop for about two minutes, the time taken to change crews, although there have been occasional instances of trains being delayed because the relief crew were not immediately available, or because a leak has been suspected in a fuel tanker.

Trains were delayed for suspected leaks on three occasions in the last 12 months and six occasions in the 12 months before that. The details of trains which may have been delayed for more than two minutes for other operational reasons are not readily available.

Airport Runways

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who are the members of his working group to examine the Civil Aviation Authority's additional runway options for the south-east; and when they are expected to report.

Mr. McLoughlin: The membership of the working group, and possible time scales for its advice, are being considered. My right hon. Friend has said that he intends the group to include representatives of local and environmental interests, airport and airline operators, the tourism and travel industry, consumer interests and Government Departments.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the Irish Government concerning the upgrading of (a) passenger and (b) freight services on the railway line between the port of Holyhead and the channel tunnel.

Mr. Freeman: I have received representations from the Minister for Tourism and Transport for the Republic of Ireland, Mr. Seamus Brennan, expressing his support for the electrification of the Crewe-Holyhead line as a means to improve Ireland's passenger and freight links with Europe via the channel tunnel.

Rail Electrification

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has been given on the returns available from electrifying the British Rail line from Crewe to Holyhead.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that work done for Gwynedd, Clwyd and Cheshire councils shows that electrification of this line would not meet British Rail's normal investment criterion of an 8 per cent. financial return. The councils have commissioned further work to establish whether the inclusion of external benefits would secure the required return.

Transport Infrastructure (South-east Essex)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plan to visit south-east Essex to review the transport infrastructure in that part of the county.

Mr. Chope: No visit is planned at present.

North-western Railway Line

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the investment programme to speed up services on the main north-western railway line.

Mr. Freeman: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) on 9 July at column 82.

Merchant Ships

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many British-owned merchant ships are currently operating under foreign flags.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information requested is given in the table.

United Kingdom owned trading vessels of 100 gross tons and above at 31 March 1990

Registry	Number	Gross tons ('000)	Deadweight tonnes ('000)
United Kingdom	507	4,044	4,490
Crown Dependencies[1]	79	1,613	2,933
ODTs (excluding Hong Kong)[2]	48	2,119	4,016

Registry	Number	Gross tons ('000)	Deadweight tonnes ('000)
Hong Kong	42	981	1,512
Foreign	125	1,271	2,104
Total	801	10,029	15,504

[1] The Crown Dependencies are the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands.

[2] 'ODTs' are the Overseas Dependent Territories of Aguilla, British Antarctic Territory, Bermuda, British Indian Ocean Territory, British Virgin Islands, Cayman Islands, Falkland Islands, Gibraltar, Hong Kong, Montserrat, St. Helena, Turks & Caicos.

Radioactive Waste

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department intends to review the guidelines for the transport of low-level radioactive waste from (a) commercial sources, (b) nuclear industry sources and (c) military sources; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The transport of all radioactive materials must be made in compliance with regulations based on internationally agreed safety standards laid down by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). These standards are subject to continual review.

The Advisory Committee on the Safe Transport of Radioactive Materials (ACTRAM) recently carried out a study on the transport of this material. The results were published in 1988 entitled "The Transport of Low Level Waste in the UK". A copy has been placed in the Library.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total volume of radioactive waste transported by (a) road, (b) rail and (c) air in each year since 1983.

Mr. Chope: The information requested is not available.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents involving the transport of low-level radioactive waste have occurred in each year since 1983.

Mr. Chope: There have been three accidents to vehicles carrying low-level radioactive waste since 1964.

Stockport Bypass

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish compulsory purchase orders in respect of the A6(M) Stockport north-south bypass.

Mr. Chope: I will write to my hon. Friend about this.

Rail Fares (Yorkshire)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to by how much rail fares in south Yorkshire are due to be increased, from what date, and the reason for the increase.

Mr. Freeman: Fare levels on local rail services in south Yorkshire are a matter for the passenger transport authority and executive. I understand that an increase is planned but that the details have yet to be finalised.

Property Sales

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many homes have been sold by his Department since the beginning of 1989 and in the last three months; and what criteria are used in deciding to whom the properties will be disposed.

Mr. Chope: Since the beginning of 1989 159 residential properties have been sold, including 23 in the last three months. Where appropriate, a property is offered first to the tenant if the terms of the tenancy so require, then to the former owner depending on the circumstances under which it was acquired.

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are taken to make available properties disposed of by his Department to housing associations or local authorities.

Mr. Chope: Local authorities and housing associations are able to bid for the properties when they are offered for sale on the open market.

Correspondence

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report his answer to the letter from Mr. Arthur Doe of Brockhurst, Maurys lane, West Wellow, Romsey, dated 29 April, which was sent to him on 4 May and again on 26 June under Department of Transport reference number A/P50/15174/89.

Mr. Chope: I have today written to my hon. Friend.

Speed Humps

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those London boroughs and metropolitan areas where speed humps have been introduced so far as the information is available to him; and what is the density of distribution of such humps in each case.

Mr. Freeman: The decision whether to install speed humps lies with local highway authorities. Information on installations is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has in regard to the numbers of accidents attributable directly to the introduction of speed humps in the Greater London area.

Mr. Freeman: None, nor am I aware of any such relationship. Our liaison arrangements with local authorities will alert us should any problem arise in future.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the information he has on the effect on road safety of the introduction of speed bumps in urban areas.

Mr. Freeman: The Speed Hump Regulations 1990, making it easier for local highway authorities to instal speed humps, came into effect only three months ago. The prescribed designs are based on extensive research in the United Kingdom and overseas with safety as a key factor. We shall be monitoring their effects.

Slowing traffic down to safe speeds in residential areas will undoubtedly save many lives.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Earnings

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) men and (b) women earn (i) over £25,000, (ii) over £30,000, (iii) over £35,000, (iv) over £40,000, (v) £45,000 and (vi) over £50,000 per year.

Mr. Ryder: Available information for 1990-91 is in the table. It is not possible to provide accurate estimates for the analysis by men and women for the categories of earnings over £35,000.

Earned income (£ pa)	Men (thousands)	Women (thousands)
More than £25,000	1,400	150
More than £30,000	830	80
More than £35,000	620
More than £40,000	400
More than £45,000	300
More than £50,000	220

Estimates are based on a projection of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes and are therefore provisional.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people who pay tax are below the upper earnings limit.

Mr. Ryder: It is estimated that, in 1990-91, there will be about 19¼ million taxpayers in employment and self-employment aged under 65 with earned income below £18,200, the upper earnings limit for national insurance contributions purposes.

Personal Equity Plans

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was, for each year that personal equity plans have been in operation (a) the number and proportion of people with personal equity plans who are on the higher rate of tax and (b) the cost to his Department in total of personal equity plans and per person with a personal equity plan.

Mr. Ryder: The latest available information is shown in the reply to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 19 February, column 515.

Income Statistics

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated average and median (a) original, (b) gross and (c) post-tax income in 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder: Estimates of original, gross and post-tax income are derived from the family expenditure survey. Latest figures are for 1987 and were published in the May 1990 edition of Economic Trends. Estimates for 1990 will be available in due course when the 1990 family expenditure survey is completed and processed.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library the full report of the latest survey of personal incomes; and if he will make it his policy that the sample size in future surveys be sufficiently large to provide county-level estimates of the number of taxpayers, the number of higher-rate taxpayers, and of taxable income which are statistically reliable.

Mr. Ryder: A range of tables compiled from the latest survey of personal incomes will, as is now the practice, be published in the next edition of "Inland Revenue Statistics" before the end of the year. Other information has been extracted from the survey as needs arose, some of which has already been published.

All sample surveys are subject to some degree of statistical variation. The size of the sample of surveys of personal incomes must continue to be set with a view to meeting efficiently its primary purpose of providing information relevant to the costing of income tax proposals affecting the United Kingdom as a whole. As explained in the reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 12 June, column 152, investigation is continuing into the reliability of information at the county level. Publication of county data will be resumed as soon as possible.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest estimates of (a) original, (b) gross and (c) post-tax income, by decile.

Mr. Ryder: The information for 1987, the latest available year, is given in the table:

Average household income per year[1]

[1] Equivalisation is used only for ranking the households. The figures shown above refer to unequivalised income.

[2] Post-tax income is after the deduction of direct taxes (eg income tax) and indirect taxes (eg VAT, petrol duty).

Note:
The figures are extracted from an article "The effects of taxes and benefits on household income, 1987" published in the May 1990 edition of Economic Trends.

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average, and distribution of, household income of households which contain at least one person earning above the upper earnings limit who is on the basic rate of tax.

Mr. Ryder: I regret that the information requested is not readily available and would be disproportionately expensive to provide.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the gross domestic product of the member states of the European Community in the latest convenient year.

Mr. Ryder: Following is the information requested.

GDP at purchasing power parities 1989

	United States dollars (billions)
United Kingdom	818·4
Germany	941·7
France	817·4
Italy	801·9
Belgium	135·2
Denmark	73·8
Greece	72·7
Ireland	31·2
Luxembourg	6·3
Netherlands	205·0
Portugal	72·9
Spain	396·9

Foreign Exchange Transactions

Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the total cost of transactions between European Community member states in foreign exchange in the latest convenient year.

Mr. Ryder: The Government have not made such an estimate.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1960 consumption of goods other than food and fuel as a percentage of gross domestic product together with the balance of trade in manufactures.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information can be derived from data on the CSO's database, which may be accessed through the Library. The database indentifiers are:
Consumers' expenditure other than food and energy products
Sum of:
Durable goods (AIIL)
Alcohol and tobacco (CDFH)
Clothing and footwear (CDDE)
Other goods (CCED)
GDP at market prices (CAOB)
Balance of trade in manufactures (BPJF)
(available only from 1970).

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing in May 1990 prices the balance of trade in manufactures, less erratics on a balance of payments basis, in 1977, 1978, 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information from which the balance of trade in manufactures less erratics at May 1990 prices may be derived can be found in the monthly review of external trade statistics and its mid-year supplement, and also through the Central Statistical Office database, which may be accessed through the Library of the House.

Retail Prices Index

Mr. Speller: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to alter the Laspeyres-based formula for the retail prices index.

Mr. Ryder: No. The Laspeyres formula, which gives each item a relative importance or "weight" in accordance with the consumption pattern in a specified base period, is recognised throughout the world as the most satisfactory method of constructing a regular consumer price index. The particular variant used for the United Kingdom retail prices index, known as the "chain Laspeyres" formula, minimises the disadvantages of using historical consumption patterns by updating the weights at the beginning of each year.

EC Budget

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate for the United Kingdom's contribution to the European Community's budget.

Mr. Ryder: The latest estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the European Community's budget in 1990 is £2,175 million. This appeared in the "Statement on the 1990 Community Budget" (Cm 1059).

Capital and Running Costs

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the entitlements for 1990-91 resulting from the carry forward of capital and running costs underspend allowed under the end-year flexibility schemes.

Mr. Norman Lamont: A list of entitlements totalling £410,935,000 for capital expenditure and £19,230,000 for running costs is shown in the following table.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, individual cash limits and running costs limits will be increased when entitlement is taken up.

The total increase in cash limits resulting from the take-up of end-year flexibility will be charged to the Reserve and will therefore not add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Commemorative Coins

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if Her Majesty's Government plan to issue any new commemorative coins.

Mr. Major: Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to approve my recommendation that a 50p coin be issued featuring a special commemorative design to celebrate Britain's presidency of the Council of Ministers in 1992 and the single European market. In addition to circulating versions of the coin, collectors' version will be issued in base metal, silver and gold.

"Next Steps"

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the application of "next steps" to the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise.

Mr. Major: In February 1988 my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister launched the "next steps" initiative. In addition to their policy responsibilities, both Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise have significant executive functions, and they are therefore entirely suitable for applying the principles of "next steps." I have now conducted a review with the chairmen of Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise of the best way to do so.

Each department already operates within an individual statutory framework, which defines the tasks of the department and the relationship between the chairman and the board on the one hand and Treasury Ministers on the other. These arrangements will remain, but I have decided that it would be in the interests of the taxpayer, the public and the staff of the departments to introduce changes which will enable them to operate fully on "next steps" lines. In particular I want to give greater impetus to enhancing internal accountability and delegation, consistent with the management of a tax system which needs to offer all taxpayers equality of treatment.

Following a review by Inland Revenue officials I have concluded that the valuation offices for England and Wales and for Scotland should be launched as a single executive agency under a chief executive who will be appointed by open competition. The aim is to set up the agency in the summer of 1991. The valuation offices already operate as discrete management units and are responsible for negotiating the valuation of land and buildings for a variety of purposes for central and local government; the valuation office for England and Wales also undertakes the valuation of business property for rating purposes. The offices employ over 5,000 staff. Agency status for this work will increase the offices' ability to focus on the work to be done and give their managers more responsibility and flexibility to carry out their task. These benefits should enable them to achieve continuing improvements in efficiency, effectiveness and accountability, and increase the commitment of staff to providing a high-quality valuation service for their customers.

In its other work also the Inland Revenue has well-defined lines of management responsibility and internal accountability through its network of regions and local offices, and its specialist units. It operates a comprehensive system of performance targets which are published annually in its management plans with departmental performance reviewed in the board's annual report, and there is an extensive training and management development programme for staff. It is also tackling major changes flowing from recent reforms in the tax system and in the way it does its work. The Department will need great flexibility to cope with these changes. To this end it will be further extending internal delegation and accountability, and examining ways of reshaping the structure and organisation of its work, all on "next steps" lines, so as to ensure that the Department continues to be responsive to the needs of taxpayers and provide a high level of service. I have asked the chairman of the Inland Revenue to draw up and submit to me an action programme for this work.

The Inland Revenue is also reviewing the organisation of information technology in the Department, to determine what arrangements will best meet the needs of the Department throughout the 1990s. An announcement will be made in due course.

To the same ends Customs and Excise will reorganise the bulk of its activity into executive units encompassing some 95 per cent. of its staff. The head of each unit will be appointed by the chairman and enjoy increased managerial and operational freedoms within a clearly defined framework of targets, responsibilities and accountabilities. Key features are:

(i) there will be a published framework document for the Department, and a separate framework document for each unit. The head of each unit will be appointed by the chairman and will be accountable to the board;

(ii) the Customs and Excise management plan and the board's annual report will contain progressively improved information about financial and other targets and outturns for the board and for each unit;

(iii) a radical change in the management of staff and their methods of conducting the Department's business, giving managers the maximum possible freedom to operate controls according to assessments of risk and local circumstances and to exercise local authority and discretion both in financial controls and operational systems;

(iv) new emphasis on the individual initiative and expertise of staff with an ambitious programme of management training and development; and

(v) further improvements in service, aimed at minimising burdens on business and the travelling public, and making significant improvements in the information and services the Department provides.

I have asked the chairman of Customs and Excise to draw up an action programme for making these changes, with the objective of having the executive unit structure in place by April 1991. The first step will be to publish the departmental framework document in the autumn. At the same time, the Department will publish the first individual framework documents in a series which will set out the objectives and responsibilities of each executive unit. The programme will be kept under review, and this will include consideration whether certain of the units should become candidates for conversion into freestanding agencies.

Each Department has already made considerable progress in improving its management. But these are important changes. I am confident that operating fully on "next steps" lines the two Departments will deliver further significant improvements in the way they are managed and, in turn, greater efficiency, better service to the public and enhanced commitment and enthusiasm from their staff.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for each of the years of the existence of the business expansion scheme what was (a) the total amount invested in the business expansion scheme, (b) the total cost to the Exchequer, (c) the percentage and amount of business expansion scheme money invested, and (d) the associated cost to the Exchequer, in residential and assured tenancy schemes.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The latest estimates are shown in the table:

	Amounts invested		Cost of tax relief
	Total	[1]Of which invested in private rented housing	Total	[1]Of which in respect of investment in private rented housing
1983-84	105	—	50	—
1984-85	148	—	75	—
1985-86	157	—	85	—
1986-87	168	—	95	—
1987-88[2]	191	—	110	—
1988-89[2]	425	375	150	130
1989-90[2]	175	150	60	50

[1] The scheme was extended to include investment in private rented housing from 1988-89.
[2] Provisional estimates.

Married Couples' Allowance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the increase in personal allowances would have to be if the married couples' allowance were frozen in cash terms at the level it is at the present time, so that post-tax real income remained constant for the average married couple; and what would be the cost of each of these changes and the combined cost.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 23 July 1990]: This would depend on the rates of growth in the various categories of income subject to income tax between the current year and the future year for which the comparison is required as well as the inflation rate.

Income Tax

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much revenue would be raised if tax was levied at 50 per cent. for those earning £50,000 and above, 45 per cent. for those earning £40,000 to £50,000, the 40 per cent. band remained as at present and the upper earnings limit was removed;

(2) how much revenue would be raised if tax was levied at 50 per cent. for those earning £50,000 and above, 45 per cent. for those earning £40,000 to £50,000 and the 40 per cent. band remained as at present.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The yield in a full year at 1990-91 levels of income of introducing the rates of income tax shown in the table is estimated to be about £500 million.

Taxable income £	Rate Per cent.
1-20,700	25
20,701-40,000	40
40,001-50,000	45
50,001 and over	50

Taxable income is income subject to tax from all sources after deducting allowances and reliefs.

The estimate does not take account of the consequential effect on capital gains tax, nor does it allow for any behavioural effects that might result from such an increase.

The additional yield from abolishing the upper earnings limit for employees' class 1 national insurance contributions is estimated to be £2½ billion.

Profit-related Pay

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost to the Exchequer in each year of the profit-related pay scheme.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The latest available information is shown in the reply to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 13 February, column 121.

Tax Relief

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the value of tax relief on pensions, savings/investment for and payment of, to (a) individuals, and (b) employers for the latest available year given the figures broken down by (i) occupational and (ii) private provision, if available.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The latest estimates in respect of 1989-90 of the reductions in tax liabilities arising from the individual tax reliefs related to pensions schemes are shown in the table:

	£ million
Relief for:
Employees' contributions to occupational pension schemes[2]	1,800
Employers' contributions to occupational pension schemes[2,3]	[1]3,100
Investment income of occupational pension schemes[2,4]	4,100
Lump sum payments to pensioners[2,4]	1,000
Contributions to personal pensions (including retirement annuity premia and FSAVCs)[3,5]	800

[1] This figure is particularly tentative and subject to a wide margin of error.
[2] The total cost of tax reliefs for pension schemes cannot be calculated by adding together the costs of individual reliefs as this would imply a considerable degree of multiple taxation.
[3] On the basis that under present arrangements employers' contributions are not taxable as a benefit in kind of the employee.
[4] Assuming relief at the basic rate of income tax.
[5] It is not possible to provide reliable estimates of the cost of exemption for investment income and lump sum payments related to retirement annuity contracts.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 24 July 1990]: The Government's economic policies are designed to maintain a vigorous economy in which business and enterprise can flourish. The Treasury therefore places a high priority on helping small business, and among the specific measures taken over the last 12 months have been:

- an increase in the profits limit for small companies' rate of corporation tax by a third to £200,000, and the limit for marginal relief from the main rate also increased by a third to £1 million;
- introduction of simplified VAT registration requirements which will help keep new small businesses out of the VAT net for longer;
- introduction of a comprehensive bad debt relief scheme for VAT;
- highest permissible increase under EC law in the VAT threshold;
- increase in the annual investment limit under the business expansion scheme to £750,000;
- introduction of a simplified VAT return with five boxes for completion in place of nine;
- introduction of the option of three-line statements instead of full accounts for businesses with turnover of less than £10,000;
- improvements to the VAT cash accounting scheme for businesses with turnovers not exceeding £250,000;
- relaxations to the record-keeping requirements under the VAT second-hand schemes;
- the introduction of fast-lane procedures to reduce the time taken to clear certain EC imports;
- the introduction of a simplified ATA carnet.

Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise officials also continuously review forms, explanatory notices and leaflets with the aim of providing guidance which is easily understood.

The success of the Government's policies is demonstrated by the latest statistics on VAT registrations, which show a record increase in the number of businesses registered for VAT, around 1,700 a week on average, during 1989.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Accountancy Firms

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement on the reasons for including accountancy firms criticised by his Department's inspectors on the joint disciplinary scheme.

Mr. Redwood: The joint disciplinary scheme is operated by the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, and the Chartered Association of Certified Accountants. I understand that, in selecting individuals to sit on any committee of inquiry set up under the scheme, account is taken of all relevant factors including whether having on that team someone from an accountancy firm criticised by the Department's inspectors is in any way material to the case.

Electricity Supply Industry

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration he has given to the application of United Kingdom competition legislation in relation to the arrangements for the restructuring of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Redwood: I have today laid before the House an order made under section 100(2) of the Electricity Act 1989, exempting certain electricity agreements from the ambit of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976. Two previous orders were made on 27 March and 28 June respectively.

The various orders, which were made following consultation with the Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT) and the Director General of Electricity Supply (DGES), apply in relation to the following categories of agreements entered into by the electricity supply industry (ESI) in England and Wales, and in Scotland, prior to vesting day on 31 March 1990 or as a consequence of the new industry structure:

Pooling and Settlement Arrangements
Initial Settlement Arrangements
Contracts for Differences
Connection and Use of System Agreements
Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation (NFFO) Qualifying Arrangements
Non-Fossil Purchasing Agency (NFPA) Arrangements
French Interconnection Arrangements
Scottish Interconnection Arrangements
British Grid Systems Agreement
Dounreay Supply Agreement
Cable Maintenance Agreements.

These agreements are an essential part of the process of ensuring an orderly transition to new competitive arrangements within the ESI. By exempting them from the application of United Kingdom restrictive trade practices legislation, the orders will help to ensure a stable framework within which effective competition may develop. The actions of the various companies remain subject in the normal way to the anti-competitive practices provisions of the Competition Act 1980 and to the monopoly provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973.

The exemptions provided by these orders are intended to remain in force for the duration of the individual agreements, provided that there is no material change in the relevant circumstances. However, where agreements last for more than five years from vesting day (or eight years in the case of the NFFO arrangements), it may be appropriate to review the continuing need for the exemptions at some stage following the expiry of those periods, taking account of the competitive environment then prevailing.

Such a review is not expected to result in wide-ranging changes in the basic arrangements now in place in the industry. In particular, the pooling and settlement arrangements, which lie at the core of the new market structure for the buying and selling of electricity, are expected to remain in place indefinitely on the basis that the relevant agreements will be subject to close and regular scrutiny by the Director General of Electricity Supply as part of his general responsibilities under the Electricity Act.

The Government are committed to the introduction of new legislation on restrictive trade practices, in implementation of the proposals outlined in the White Paper "Opening Markets: New Policy on Restrictive Trade Practices" (Cm. 727) published in July 1989. It is our intention that any exemptions still in force at the commencement of the new legislation should be carried forward in transitional arrangements. The introduction of such legislation is subject to the availability of parliamentary time.

Leather Industry

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support Her Majesty's Government are providing to the United Kingdom leather industry to enable it to meet the advancing technological requirements of the sector.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am pleased to announce that my Department is to provide assistance to a research programme of five projects on improvements to the control of leather production and the quality of leather. The DTI contribution will be £1,642,694 towards total costs of £4,199,271.

The work sponsored by DTI will be carried out on behalf of the industry by the British Leather Confederation in Northampton over the next five years.

Single Market

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to extend the scope of his single market campaign to help business to prepare for the single European market.

Mr. Lilley: As part of the single market campaign my Department has in recent months emphasised the natural role of business support organisations, such as chambers of commerce and trade associations, in providing the detailed information and advice needed by the business community. I am encouraged by the growing role such organisations are playing in complementing my Department's continuing single market information service. But I have concluded that there is a need to help them further develop their single market services in the run-up to 1992.

I am therefore making available to business support organisations a package of measures to help them develop and improve their services on single market matters. The package includes financial assistance towards acquiring single market expertise, improving their delivery of single market services and access to my Department's single market database, Spearhead.

Cable Television

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements he proposes to make for licensing under the Telecommunications Act 1984 existing cable television relay systems which do not at present require to be licensed under the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984, should the proposals in the Broadcasting Bill receive parliamentary approval.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to the reply, 7 June 1990, col. 670-71]: Details of the licensing regime for SMATV systems under the Telecommunications Act 1984 and the provisions in the Broadcasting Bill should it receive Royal Assent were given in an answer by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office on 2 March 1990, col. 351-52, and in the earlier answers given to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North.

SMATV systems in new housing developments in the process of being built on the date that the relevant provisions of the Broadcasting Bill enter into force, the transfer date, will be regarded for licensing purposes as having carried all four terrestrial channels and all five United Kingdom DBS channels immediately before the transfer date provided that:

(a) the contract with the prospective licensee to build such a system was signed and any necessary planning permission granted on or before today's date; and

(b) at least 50 per cent. of the homes on the system were capable of receiving all four terrestrial channels and all five United Kingdom DBS channels immediately before the transfer date.

Those running such systems will thus qualify for an individual Telecommunications Act licence authorising the system to carry, after the transfer date, any television or radio services other than those proscribed under provisions contained in clause 165 of the Broadcasting Bill. Systems covering 1,000 homes or more will also qualify for a five-year diffusion service licence (if the system lies within a cable franchise area) or a five-year local delivery service licence (if it lies outside). Applications for these licences will have to be made in advance of the transfer date.

Any other system partially built at the transfer date will be regarded for licensing purpose as having been built after the transfer date.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Bereavement Damages

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Attorney-General when the Lord Chancellor's consultation paper on bereavement damages will be published.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor published a consultation paper on bereavement damages in March this year. Copies of the paper were placed in the Library on publication.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Uganda

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give a breakdown of European Community aid to Uganda for each of the last five years; what the United Kingdom contribution was for each year; whether the aid was provided for emergency relief, project aid or programme aid; and to which regions of Uganda the aid was targeted.

Mrs. Chalker: European Community aid commitments to Uganda since 1985 have been as follows:

Year	[1] Project Aid	[1] Programme Aid	[1] Emergency Aid	[1] Food Aid
1985	—	—	0·1	—
1986	6·0	—	1·5	1·2
1987	77·7	15·0	4·4	0·7
1988	10·7	15·0	0·8	1·5
1989	30·4	—	—	7·9
1990	54·5	—	0·7	—

[1] All figures in millions of ecu. 1 ecu is approximately £0·7.

The United Kingdom contribution to the current (sixth) European development fund (1985-90) is 16·58 per cent. of the total.

The majority of the emergency and food aid for Uganda has been allocated to the north. A number of different regions have benefited from the project and programme aid, including Kampala, the north-east, the east, Karamoja, Masaka, Mbarara, Kabale amd Mpigi.

Details of the separate bilateral aid programme administered by ODA were given in my reply to the right hon. Gentleman of 7 June.

ODA Refugees Section

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration has been given to taking the Overseas Development Administration's refugees section out of the emergency relief section of Overseas Development Administration.

Mrs. Chalker: None. The present arrangements work extremely well.

Emergency Budget

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how the procedure for monitoring and evaluating projects funded under the Overseas Development Administration's emergency budget differs from procedures for projects under the regular aid budget.

Mrs. Chalker: There is no single procedure for either monitoring or evaluating emergency aid operations. Monitoring is usually continuous since the emergency actions are generally of relatively short duration. Procedures for evaluating emergency aid are the same as those for projects funded from the regular aid programme, but the methodology chosen for each study reflects the nature of the project under evaluation.

African Refugees

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all grants from the Overseas Development Administration to projects of the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa and to the reserve fund of ICARA.

Mrs. Chalker: Since 1984 ODA has made the following grants to projects under the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa:

Red Cross

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further assistance Her Majesty's Government are providing in the current year for the International Committee of the Red Cross.

Mrs. Chalker: I have just announced a further contribution to ICRC of £2·6 million, £1·6 million for its Africa programmes and £1 million towards its major programme for Afghan refugees in both Pakistan and Afghanistan.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Animal Welfare

Mr. Donald Thompson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on representations received following the recent lobby of Parliament on animal welfare, organised by Compassion in World Farming.

Mr. Maclean: I welcome the widest possible debate on the vitally important issue of animal welfare.

The Government are pressing for improved welfare standards to be adopted throughout the European Community. We are currently seeking in the Council important new welfare safeguards for pigs and calves. Among our objectives in these negotiations are to secure the phasing out of unacceptable husbandry systems, as recommended by the Farm Animal Welfare Council, and to extend throughout the Community our ban on the close confinement of veal calves in crates.

The parliamentary lobby highlighted the concern about transport conditions for farm livestock. The Government fully share this concern.

We cannot, as has been suggested, ban exports of live animals under article 36 of the treaty of Rome, as there is already Community law on the protection of animals during international transport. It is most important, however, to ensure that all animal transport is carried out with proper regard to welfare and the Government will be negotiating to this end in discussions on the Commission's proposals for new Community measures on protection of animals in transport, whether to, from or between member states.

Special rules are proposed for animals going for slaughter. The Government will be pressing particularly here for agreement to maintain our controls on trade in horses for slaughter.

The Government welcome any support from those concerned with animal welfare for their efforts to achieve practicable and enforceable welfare safeguards in the Community.

Agricultural Development Advisory Service

Mr. Hague: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for organisational developments within the Agricultural Development Advisory Service.

Mr. Gummer: I have reviewed the options for the future organisation of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service (ADAS). As I announced in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on 26 February, the central veterinary laboratory and the veterinary medicines directorate became executive agencies from 2 April 1990. The state veterinary service will transfer from ADAS to the Ministry's food safety directorate on 1 August 1990.

The central science laboratory of the research and development service (RDS) is largely engaged on work directly supporting Government policies, particularly on plant health, environmental and wildlife issues. I have concluded that this laboratory is not a candidate for privatisation, but that it should be established as a separate executive agency.

The farm and countryside service (FCS) is engaged to a substantial degree on providing consultancy and other services to farmers and others. The aim is that these commercial services should achieve full cost recovery in due course. The FCS also provides important services to support various areas of the Government's policy work. It is important that a commercial framework and incentives should be established for this work undertaken for Government.

I have therefore concluded that the FCS, together with the experimental husbandry farms and other units in the field R and D division of the research and development service, should be established as a separate agency with the intention that it will as soon as possible become a trading fund. The Government believe that privatisation could, in the longer run, be the logical development for such an organisation.

I am arranging for detailed studies to be put in hand to define precisely the functions to be undertaken in each of the two new agencies and the arrangements for ensuring that full collaboration is maintained between them. It is my intention that both the CSL and the FCS/RDS field R and D division should achieve agency status by 1 April 1992. The drafting of the agency framework agreements will also be carried forward.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I will consider what arrangements for the FCS might apply in Wales.

These changes will have important implications for the organisation of the Ministry, including particularly the regional and divisional organisation. I am therefore commissioning an internal review of the organisation needed to undertake the other functions of the regions and divisions.

Agricultural Training Board

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he and his ministerial colleagues have concluded their consideration of the outstanding recommendations of the report on the agricultural training board presented by Mr. John E. Smith, November 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Yes. We have concluded that it would be appropriate to extend the remit of the agricultural training board to permit it to offer its training services, at full economic cost, to a wider range of rural businesses, having regard to the existing provision for training and subject to ministerial direction. This will require primary legislation for which an early opportunity will be sought, so as to enable the board to continue its policy of raising more of its finance from the market. The level of Exchequer funding for future years will be determined, as usual, in the context of the Government's overall decisions on public expenditure. We shall bear in mind the longer-term recommendation on the composition of the board, but we have no immediate plans to alter it or to seek fresh legislation in this respect.

Veterinary Costs

Mr. Hague: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what decisions he has made about the continuation of the subsidy for veterinary costs in export-approved meat plants, in view of the European Community rules on meat inspection charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The Community rules on charges for meat inspection were adopted by the Council of Ministers in June 1988 in decision 88/408/EEC and directive 88/409/EEC. They must be brought into effect not later than 1 January 1991 and, inter alia, they prohibit the subsidisation of meat inspection costs except where the actual costs of inspection exceed specified standard charges.

In these circumstances, the scheme introduced in 1983 under which the Government meet the costs of veterinary supervision and certification in plants producing red meat, poultry meat, game meat and meat products to export standard, and also the cost of testing for trichinosis and residues when required by importing countries, will end on 31 December 1990. We shall be consulting interested parties on the new arrangements for meat inspection charges shortly.

State Veterinary Service

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many animal health officers are now in post within the state veterinary service; and what qualifications were required for recruitment.

Mr. Maclean: There are currently one hundred and forty-six and a half animal health officers in post in the state veterinary service. The qualifications for entry require candidates to be at least 20 years of age, physically fit, hold a current driving licence and have 4 GCE O-levels or CSE grade 1 passes including English and a scientific subject. Equivalent qualifications are also considered.

East Coast Salmon Fisheries

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the review of east coast salmon fisheries under the Salmon Act 1986 to be laid before Parliament; and whether the review will be published as it was presented to him by the advisory body, without alteration.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which was given to my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) on 29 June, Official Report, column 388. As that reply made clear, scientists from both Fisheries Departments have been collecting a range of scientific information on which the review required under section 39 of the Salmon Act 1986 is to be based. We will be reporting to Parliament on the review as soon as the review is complete.

Milk Marketing Board

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for changes in the constitution of the Milk Marketing Board.

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend the Minister has for some time been urging the dairy industry to come forward with proposals for change to the milk marketing arrangements. I will consider sympathetically any proposals it makes which would lead to a more competitive industry better able to respond positively to the challenges and opportunities of the single market.

Wild Rabbits

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the annual cost to (a) farming and (b) forestry of damage caused by wild rabbits; and what is his estimate of their current numbers.

Mr. Maclean: Damage from wild rabbits to agriculture and horticulture in the United Kingdom is estimated to cost £100 million to £150 million annually. I do not have any information on the costs to forestry.

National surveys between 1980 and 1986 showed a steady increase in the population of rabbits particularly in eastern and south-eastern areas. They are now estimated to number 30 million, about one third the level which existed before the arrival of myxomatosis.

Pet Food

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take action to make the voluntary ban on the inclusion of specified offals in pet food statutory.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) on 20 July, Official Report, column 761.

1990 Harvest

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the 1990 harvest.

Mr. Maclean: Much of the winter barley crop has now been harvested in good conditions. Latest reports indicate that quality is around average and yields variable, with lower yields being obtained from barley grown on light land which has been most affected by lack of water. Harvesting of spring barley has only just started and harvesting of the wheat crop is expected to begin shortly. It is too early to say what the overall quality and size of the 1990 United Kingdom cereals harvest is likely to be.

North Sea Conference

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about his implementation of the agreements from the last North sea conference.

Mr. Maclean: The targets and timetables set by Her Majesty's Government for implementation of the agreements reached at the third North sea conference in March this year were published in the United Kingdom guidance note on the ministerial declaration on 6 July 1990. This publication is available in the Library of the House.

Set-aside scheme

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any plans to introduce grazed fallow as an option for agricultural land entered into the set-aside scheme.

Mr. Maclean: A limited form of grazed fallow is one of a number of options for the better management of set-aside land which we have been considering. We shall announce any changes to the management conditions in time for the start of the third year of the scheme.

Dredging and Extraction

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether his Department has made representations calling for a moratorium on further licences for marine sand and gravel extraction pending research on its effect on the sea-bed.

Mr. Maclean: The Department has worked consistently to ensure that fishing interests are safeguarded when licences for marine sand and gravel extraction are considered. The planned research into the speed with which dredged areas recolonise will improve our understanding of the factors involved. We could not justify blocking any new licences until this research has been completed, but we will continue to work with the fishing industry through the established consultation procedures to ensure that fisheries are properly protected.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to introduce a requirement to fit positioning devices on dredgers to ensure that they do not stray out of their licensed areas.

Mr. Maclean: The Crown Estate, which issues licences for dredging sand and gravel from the sea bed, is planning to carry out trials this year with position recorders on three vessels. Provided that these trials are successful, any licences issued after 1991 will require dredging vessels to carry a position recorder and it is expected that most dredging vessels will be carrying position recorders by the end of 1992.

Fire-raising

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), Official Report, 17 May, column 1003, what best endeavours he has displayed to draw the problem of fires, deliberately started by teenagers, to the attention of authorities in relation to the protection of wildlife.

Mr. Maclean: I have written to my colleagues at the Home Office, the Department of the Environment and the Welsh Office, drawing this matter to their attention.

Sewage Slick (East Anglia)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received with regard to the sewage slick off the coast of East Anglia.

Mr. Maclean: None.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he proposes to take to protect the onshore fishing industry of East Anglia from the effects of the sewage slick in the Yarmouth area.

Mr. Maclean: Following consultation with the Department's marine scientists Anglian Water installed a long sea outfall which, following the completion of sewerage work in the Yarmouth catchment area, will remove the remaining sewage after fine screening to a sea area where it will safely disperse and degrade.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. McFall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the National Farmers Union to discuss BSE.

Mr. Maclean: Ministers in this Department are in regular discussion with the National Farmers Union on a wide range of issues, including BSE.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish by means of a press release each month until November 1990, the reported cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy by county in England and Wales and by region in Scotland.

Mr. Gummer: Yes; I will issue a press release showing the numbers of suspect cases placed under restrictions each month by county and region. The information will be published one month in arrears to ensure its accuracy.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many reported cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy there have been in each county in England and Wales and each region in Scotland in the last month; and what are the cumulative totals by county.

Mr. Gummer: The table sets out the number of BSE suspects placed under restriction in June 1990, the most recent complete month, and the cumulative number of such suspects reported since 21 June 1988, when the disease became notifiable, up to 30 June 1990.

Cattle Records

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he intends his new breeding and movement records scheme for cattle to be compulsory; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Yes.

Fishing Grants

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to release fishing grants (a) United Kingdom 0-144-89, (b) United Kingdom 0-122-89, (c) United Kingdom 0-117-89 and (d) United Kingdom 0-113-89.

Mr. Curry: The beneficiaries concerned can expect to receive payment within the next seven days.

Intervention Stores

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the amounts in weight of (a) butter, (b) beef and (c) wheat which have been in intervention in each of the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is available from the monthly notes deposited in the Library of the House.

Agriculture Council

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 24 July.

Mr. Gummer: I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting together with my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), the Parliamentary Secretary in my Department.

Discussion concentrated on the GATT negotiations. The Council noted that it had been agreed that the text produced by the chairman of the GATT agriculture negotiating group would be used as a means of intensifying the negotiations. The Council agreed that it was important that CAP mechanisms should be protected during these negotiations, subject to the agreement already reached that support should be reduced substantially, and progressively and taking account also of the need to secure a satisfactory outcome. I made clear the United Kingdom's support for the Community's demand that agricultural subsidies should be assessed fairly and diminished on an equitable basis. I also supported strongly the Commission's insistence that all agricultural products were subject to the negotiations and that there could be no question of excluding products of particular regions of Europe. Discussion is likely to be resumed in the Council in the autumn.

I emphasised the need for the Commission to ensure orderly marketing of soft fruit imported from eastern Europe into the Community. Very low prices do nothing to help eastern European producers while hitting our own.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sports Grounds (Safety)

Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress made in implementing the recommendations made by Lord Justice Taylor in respect of the safety of sports grounds.

Mr. John Patten: Our initial response to Lord Justice Taylor's final report on the Hillsborough stadium disaster was summarised in my right hon. and learned Friend's statement on 29 January at columns 19-22, and our detailed interim responses to its 76 specific recommendations were set out more fully in the schedule placed in the Vote Office on that date.

A large number of the safety recommendations contained in the final report were originally included in Lord Justice Taylor's interim report. Our information is that they and many of the non-urgent safety recommendations were largely and quickly implemented by the responsible authorities. Of the main recommendations of the final report still outstanding, we have made it clear that the primary responsibility for the reduction of standing accommodation at football league clubs in accordance with the timetable proposed by Lord Justice Taylor rests with the clubs themselves. The Football Licensing Authority, whose chairman has now been named and which will become fully operational as quickly as possible, will provide in England and Wales the national inspectorate and review body recommended in the report. It will also examine the plans which league clubs have made and advise us, in due course, whether progress towards all-seated accommodation is satisfactory. Powers are available under section 11 of the Football Spectators Act 1989 to enforce that progress, if they are needed. We are still considering the application of these particular recommendations to sports other than football.

The Football Association and the Football League have agreed, as recommended in the report, to set up an advisory design council. The report's recommendations on offences and penalties are still under active consideration by the Home Office. The "Guide to Safety at Sports Grounds" is currently being revised, by the Home Departments with the assistance of a working group of experts, with a view to publication in the autumn.

Recommendations addressed to the police and the co-ordination of emergency services have, so far as practicable, been complied with. New guidance on the charges to be made by police authorities to clubs for the cost of policing inside grounds has been drafted and will be issued after the current round of consultation has been completed.

Prisons (Planning Applications)

116. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many planning applications in respect of prisons have been approved since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Since 1979, 23 prisons have received planning clearance either from the local planning authority or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. They are as follows:

Police (Traffic Activities)

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the percentage of police strength deployed on traffic activities; and what is the estimated cost of the policing resources which are absorbed by traffic-related tasks.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In 1989 approximately 8 per cent. of the total police strength in England and Wales was deployed on specialist traffic duties. The proportion of non-specialist officer's time spent on traffic matters is not recorded. The cost of police resources devoted to traffic-related tasks could not therefore be reliably estimated.

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Football Association and the Football League about implementation without delay of the recommendations contained in Lord Justice Taylor's report into the Hillsborough stadium disaster.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State has had such a discussion on behalf of my right hon. and learned Friend. My right hon. and learned Friend was unable to attend because of an urgent commitment in the House. My right hon. and noble Friend has also written to both organisations making clear the Government's view that it is for the football clubs in the first instance to respond to the recommendations in Lord Justice Taylor's report which are addressed to them. We shall be looking to the Football Licensing Authority in due course to keep us informed about progress. In the meantime arrangements have been made for regular meetings between officials of the Football Association, the Football League and the Government Departments most closely concerned, at which such matters can be discussed.

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will impose strict annual targets on British football clubs for introducing seating for spectators.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to do so. The primary responsibility for responding to Lord Justice Taylor's recommendations for the progressive removal of standing accommodation rests with the football clubs themselves. Provided that satisfactory progress is being made towards the final target dates of 1994 for first and second division clubs, and 1999 for third and fourth division clubs, we will not expect clubs to comply with a rigid programme for the reduction of standing accommodation or for the introduction of additional seating.

Forensic Pathology

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 29 January, Official Report, column 21, what is the result of his study of recommendation 3.32 of the Wasserman report on forensic pathology.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As my right hon. and learned Friend announced in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) on 19 July, we have accepted the proposals of the working party on forensic pathology including the recommendation contained in paragraph 3.32 that the Home Office, on the advice of the proposed policy advisory board for forensic pathology, should fund a number of senior lectureships in departments of forensic pathology/forensic medicine. We now await the advice of the board on this matter.

Private Security Firms

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the recommendations of his working group on the private security industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I am considering, in the light of the working group's report, a range of options for improving the regulation of the private security industry. When consideration of the issues has been completed, I will decide what circulation to give to the report and its recommendations.

Animal Procedures Committee

Mr. Andrew Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received the annual report of the Animal Procedures Committee for 1989; and when he intends to lay copies of the report before Parliament.

Mr. Waddington: I have laid before Parliament copies of the third annual report of the Animal Procedures Committee which will be published today by Her Majesty's Stationery Office as HC581.

I welcome this report, which reveals the care which the committee has taken in tackling a number of difficult issues. The control of scientific procedures on living animals is always a matter of great sensitivity and it is reassuring to see that we have a statutory but independent body which safeguards the balance between the welfare of animals and the pursuit of scientific work of real value.

I am grateful to the members of the committee for the time and skill which they devote to these matters.

Somali Nationals

Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to require Somali nationals who wish to transit the United Kingdom to obtain visas.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Under the immigration rules, Somali nationals are already required to obtain visas to enter the United Kingdom. However, like most nationalities subject to a visa requirement, Somali nationals at present benefit from a concession whereby passengers who are booked on an onward flight leaving the United Kingdom within 24 hours of their arrival do not need visas. Because of the misuse of the concession by some Somali nationals who are not genuine transit passengers, we have decided to withdraw it with effect from 15 August. From that date, all Somali nationals intending to pass through immigration control, including transit passengers, will need to obtain a visa before setting out.

Police and Fire Services (Communications)

Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to review radio communications in the police and fire services: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: It is essential that the radio communications systems used by all the emergency services enable them to provide a prompt and effective response to incidents. There is also a need to ensure that those parts of the radio spectrum allocated to the emergency services are used efficiently and that the best value of money is achieved by investing in the most effective technology. Each service determines its own radio communications requirements and there is inevitably some risk of duplication of resources and incompatibility in the systems they adopt. I have therefore put in hand a review aimed at developing a coherent strategy for the police and fire services which takes advantage of the latest developments in radio communications to provide maximum flexibility of response and interoperability within and between the services. It will take account of radio communication arrangements in the national health service including the ambulance service.

Magistrates Courts (Computers)

Dr. Blackburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he intends to make available to prospective suppliers information about the standard specification for magistrates courts computer systems.

Mr. John Patten: Work on the standard specification is due to be completed by next autumn. We are willing to make working drafts available on request to any prospective suppliers in the interests of reducing the time needed to complete the development of computer systems meeting the specification. This must, however, be on the understanding that the drafts are subject to amendment as the project proceeds, that the Home Office cannot take any responsibility for the use made of this material in advance of invitations to tender and that it is not possible to undertake to enter into correspondence about the content of the drafts.

Asylum

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on persons seeking asylum who have not come to this country directly from the country in which they fear persecution.

Mr. Waddington: The United Kingdom is committed to its obligations under the 1951 United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees. In accordance with this convention, no refugee will be moved by the United Kingdom to a territory in which his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion.

It is an internationally accepted concept that a person fleeing persecution, who cannot avail himself of the protection of the authorities of a country of which he is a national, should normally seek refuge in the first safe country reached. I agree entirely with the concept. The convention's primary function is to give refugees who cannot turn to their own authorities the protection of the international community. It is an instrument of last resort —not a licence for refugees to travel the world in search of an ideal place of residence. Where protection issues do not arise, an application should therefore be dealt with in accordance with normal immigration criteria.

Accordingly, an application for asylum from a passenger who has arrived in the United Kingdom from a country other than the country in which he fears persecution, will not normally be considered substantively. The passenger will be returned to the country from which he embarked, or to another country in which he has been since he left the country of feared persecution or, if appropriate, to his country of nationality, unless I am satisfied that the country is one in which his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, or that it would return him to such a country. However, in considering any individual case I shall take into account any evidence of substantial links with the United Kingdom which in my view would make it reasonable for the claim for asylum exceptionally to be considered here.

All western European countries which are signatories to the United Nations convention operate safe third-country procedures and the approach is consistent with the convention determining the state responsible for examining applications for asylum lodged in one of the member states of the European Communities signed in Dublin on 15 June 1990, but not as yet in force.

Firearms

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will lay before Parliament the annual report of the firearms consultative committee.

Mr. Waddington: I have placed in the Library a copy of the annual report of the Firearms Consultative Committee which is published today by Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Drugs

Mr. Knowles: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the seventh report from the Home Affairs Committee 1989-90 Session and the sixth (interim) report from the Home Affairs Committee, 1989-90 Session, on drugs.

Mr Waddington: The Government response is published today to the seventh report from the Home Affairs Committee on drug trafficking and related serious crime (HC 370) and to the sixth (interim) report "Crack: the threat of hard drugs in the next decade" (HC 356). Copies of the response (Cm 1164) have been placed in the Library.

As the response makes clear, we are very grateful to the Committee for the helpful and constructive nature of its reports and for the recommendations it has made. We have already acted on many of the recommendations.

We take a very serious view of the threat from cocaine in the form of crack, highlighted by the Committee in its interim report. We have reviewed our drugs strategy to ensure that it addresses the threat as fully and effectively as possible and measures have already been announced—notably the Home Office drugs prevention initiative—to help tackle it. We have also commissioned a major three-year research study on cocaine and "crack" prevalence looking at the extent and patterns of misuse and trends in misuse over time.

We share the Committee's view that strong action should be taken to combat money laundering and to deprive drug traffickers of their ill-gotten gains. A working group has been set up, as proposed by the Committee, to examine the potential for improving the operation of the confiscation and money laundering provisions of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986.

We also share the Committee's view that international co-operation is vital in combating illicit trafficking in drugs and bringing those involved to justice. Enactment of the Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) Act 1990 will enable the United Kingdom to ratify both the 1988 United Nations convention against the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances and the 1957 European convention on mutual assistance in criminal matters, as recommended by the Committee. The Act also provides powers, proposed by the Committee, for Customs officers to detain cash which may represent the proceeds of drug trafficking.

The Government share the Committee's total opposition to the "legalisation" of drugs, together with its view that, while law enforcement must remain a vital part of the strategy for tackling drug misuse, this must be accompanied by effective measures to reduce the demand for drugs.

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Lewes, Official Report, column 323, on 12 July, what information on drug shipments or drug seizures from illegal trafficking from European countries or from other countries is shared with the United Kingdom's European partners and with international organisations; and what limitations are applied to such information transferred.

Mr. Waddington: There are extensive and increasing exchanges of intelligence and operational information between United Kingdom Customs and police services and those of our European partners, and of other countries with which we have co-operation arrangements, about illicit drugs shipments. Where possible, the information is channelled through drug liaison officers or via Interpol, but in cases of urgency there may be direct contact between operational commanders in the countries concerned. Drug seizures are reported by the United Kingdom Customs and police to Interpol, which publishes annual statistics. In addition, Customs seizures are reported to the Customs Co-operation Council which, as well as producing annual statistics, issues bi-monthly bulletins notifying member states of major seizures, smuggling concealments and drug trends.

The provision of such information is governed by the United Nations conventions of 1961 and 1971 relating to narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances; the Naples convention of 1967 for the provision of mutual assistance between states; the Nairobi convention of 1977 for the provision of mutual international administration assistance for the prevention, investigation and repression of Customs offences; and bilateral memoranda of understanding. The sharing of such information is limited by considerations of public policy, data protection and the interests of justice.

Arrests

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were arrested by the police in England and Wales in 1986, 1988, and 1989.

Mr. Waddington: The available information relates to arrests for all types of offence, but excludes the Metropolitan police disrict. There were 1,207,000 such arrests in 1986, 1,337,000 in 1988 and 1,464,000 in 1989.

Romanian Orphans

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many adoptions of Romanian children have been authorised in the past 12 months; how many families are known to have expressed an interest in the adoption of Romanian children; and what progress is being made with measures to enable British families more easily to adopt Romanian orphans.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information relates to entry clearance applications made at the British embassy in Bucharest for Romanian children to come for adoption in the United Kingdom. Thirteen such applications have been approved since March 1990 when the first such application was made. Thirty-four further applications have been referred to the Immigration Department of the Home Office and are being considered; 26 of these have been made since the beginning of July. We are reviewing the procedures for dealing with overseas adoptions together with the Department of Health and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to see whether they can be streamlined further while continuing to provide proper protection for the children involved.

Hindley Remand Centre

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people have inflicted serious injuries on themselves, but have not been classified as attempted suicide, at Hindley remand centre in (a) 1988, (b) 1989 and (c) 1990 to date;

(2) how many people have attempted suicide at Hindley remand centre, but have been saved, during (a) 1988, (b) 1989 and (c) 1990 to date;

(3) how many people have committed suicide at Hindley remand centre during (a) 1988, (b) 1989 and (c) 1990 to date.

Mr. Waddington [holding answer 23 July 1990]: The numbers of inmates who have (i) inflicted injuries on themselves that were not regarded as suicide attempts (ii) been recorded as having attempted suicide, or (iii) died at their own hand at HM prison Hindley since 1 April 1987 are shown in the table. Incidents of self-injury are not classified according to their seriousness.

	Self-injuries	Attempted suicides	Deaths at the prisoner's own hand
1 April 1987—30 March 1988[1]	12	5	—
1 April 1988—30 March 1989[1]	34	16	—
1 April 1989—30 March 1990[1]	182	25	[2]2
1 April 1990—18 July 1990	15	16	[2]2

[1] Hindley changed its role in summer 1988 from being a youth custody centre for sentenced young offenders serving terms of 4 months or over to a centre for unconvicted males under 21.

[2] Inquests have not yet been held on an inmate who died in February 1990 and on two inmates who died in June 1990. A verdict of suicide was returned on an inmate who died in October 1989.

Broadcasting

Mr. Forman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement outlining his policy on the future of Greater London Radio.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he intends to take to encourage the British Broadcasting Corporation to develop still further its commitment to local public service radio.

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the remarks made by the Minister of State, the right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), about Greater London Radio in a speech of 16 May to a conference on independent radio represent the policy of his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington [holding answer 24 July 1990]: As explained in the Green Paper "Radio: Choices and Opportunities" published in 1987, the Government believe that there continues to be a case for BBC local radio, providing a distinctive service alongside a growing independent radio sector. It is, however, for the BBC to determine the extent of its commitment to local radio within the financial and other resources available to it. Bearing in mind increasing demand for frequencies, it is also important that those currently occupied by BBC stations should be used effectively. I will be interested to see the outcome of the BBC's forthcoming review of the operation of Greater London Radio, Greater Manchester Radio and Radio WM. More generally, the BBC's role in radio will be considered during the review leading to the renewal of the BBC's charter in 1996.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Petitions

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many petitions were presented in each of the last five years; and how many received replies from the relevant Department.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The information requested is as follows:

Session	Number of public petitions presented	Number of petitions on which Government observations have been made
1984-85	1,059	45
1985-86	516	28
1986-87	108	8
1987-88	356	156
1988-89	227	52
1989-90[1]	1,002	149

[1]To 20 July 1990.

Members' Facilities

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Lord President of the Council, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate on 23 July, if he will list the minor services and facilities which are not available during the recess stating, in each case, what the practical or economic reason is and in the latter case the savings expected.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

ENERGY

Shell Petroleum (Pipeline)

118. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many representations he has received concerning Shell Petroleum's proposal to build an ethylene pipeline from Grangemouth in Scotland to Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: A total of 263 representations were received concerning this proposal. A public inquiry was held in Haydock, Grangemouth and Carlisle between 5 and 29 June 1990. The inspector's report is expected in the autumn and I will give my decision in due course.

Nuclear Power

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to respond to the report of the Select Committee on Energy on the cost of nuclear power.

Mr. Wakeham: I have today placed copies in the Library of the House and the Vote Office of the Government's observations on the Select Committee's reports on the cost of nuclear power and the flue gas desulphurisation programme.

Electricity Distribution

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the 12 chairmen of the electricity distribution companies regarding their gearing ratio in the private sector.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave on Monday 23 July to the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam).

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the convention for the physical protection of nuclear materials; and if he will list those states that have ratified it.

Mr. Baldry: The United Kingdom hopes to ratify the convention, along with other European Community member states, in the autumn. In the meantime, we follow the guidance of the convention on practical measures for the physical protection of nuclear material and for movements between states.

Those countries which have ratified or acceded to the convention are:

Australia
Austria
Argentina
Brazil
Bulgaria
Canada
China
Czechoslovakia
Finland
German Democratic Republic
Guatemala
Hungary
Indonesia
Japan
Korea (Republic of)
Liechtenstein
Mexico
Mongolia
Norway
Paraguay Philippines
Poland
Sweden
Switzerland
Turkey
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
United States of America
Yugoslavia

Sellafield THORP

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if the safeguards regime developed for the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield will be able to verify a complete separation of civil and military reprocessing.

Mr. Baldry: The thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield will be used for the reprocessing of civil nuclear material only.

Britoil

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he considered selling the golden share in Britoil to BP; and if he will estimate what this would have raised for the Exchequer.

Mr. Wakeham: No. The special rights preference share in Britoil could be held only by a Minister of the Crown or the Treasury Solicitor.

Gas Sales

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the results of the Government's monitoring of gas sold to the market by suppliers other than British Gas for the period 1 June 1989 to 31 May 1990.

Mr. Wakeham: Thirty per cent. of the new gas contracted during the period 1 June 1989 to 31 May 1990 was sold to purchasers other than British Gas. Of this 30 per cent., 98 per cent. was sold to the power generation market. The remaining 2 per cent., or about half of 1 per cent. of the total gas contracted in the monitoring period, was contracted for sale to the general industrial and commercial gas market. Actual deliveries of new gas to industrial and commercial customers by suppliers other than British Gas were very small during the monitoring period.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Maternity Services

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the hospitals in Northern Ireland which had consultant obstetric and/or maternity beds in 1980, 1985 or the most recent year for which information is available and the numbers of beds of each type in each hospital in each year.

Mr. Needham: The information for 1980 is not available in the form requested. The information for 1981 and 1988-89 is as follows:

Teachers

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what guidance is being given to school governors in respect of the making of economies by (a) employing fewer teachers, (b) employing younger teachers or teachers of a lower level on the incremental scale, (c) refusing to allocate the full complement of promotional allowances, (d) not appointing teachers to provide substitute cover for absent teachers, (e) delaying the appointment procedure to replace a teacher who has retired or resigned and (f) excluding from appointment consideration teachers of child-bearing age.

Dr. Mawhinney: None. Information on the operation of local management of schools, which will apply from 1 April 1991, has been sent to all boards of governors.

Prisoners

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners from England, Wales, Scotland and the Irish Republic are currently serving a prison sentence in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cope: According to records held centrally 87 sentenced prisoners are recorded as born in Great Britain (records do not differentiate between those born in England, Scotland or Wales) and 20 as born in the Republic of Ireland.

Northern Ireland Tourist Board

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish the balance sheet for the New York office of the Northern Ireland tourist board for the last three years.

Mr. Needham: No separate balance sheet is drawn up for the New York office of the Northern Ireland tourist board. Expenditure by the board on its north American activities is shown in the statement of account published as part of the board's annual reports, copies of which are placed in the Library.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the alleged embezzlement of public money in the operation of the Northern Ireland tourist board in the United States of America.

Mr. Needham: In March 1990 a member of staff of the Northern Ireland tourist board employed in the New York office was dismissed on grounds of misconduct arising from the misuse of public funds. The amount in question was fully recovered.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have been dismissed from the New York office of the Northern Ireland tourist board in each of the last two years; and if he will give the reasons in each case.

Mr. Needham: Two members of the staff of the Northern Ireland tourist board employed in the New York office have been dismissed within the past two years. One was on grounds of inefficiency and the other was on grounds of gross misconduct involving misuse of public funds.

Labour Statistics

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show for the Londonderry, East constituency the number of unemployed (a) men, (b) women and (c) total unemployed, in each electoral ward in the constituency and for the wards of Ballymaquigan, Draperstown and Lecumpher in the Mid-Ulster constituency or as much of such information as is available to him.

Mr. Needham: The information requested for the Londonderry, East parliamentary constituency and the three named wards in the Mid-Ulster constituency form the district council areas Coleraine, Limavady and Magherafelt. The numbers unemployed in each of these wards at 14 June 1990, the latest date for which figures are available, are as follows:

Crime Statistics

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what information he has available to indicate how many (a) men, (b) women and (c) juveniles charged in the last three years and in this year to date with (ii) possession of firearms, (i) possession of ammunition, (iii) possession of explosives, (iv) attempted murder and (v) murder were also charged with membership of an illegal organisation, showing for each category the numbers associated with each illegal organisation;

(2) how many (a) adult male and (b) adult female prisoners there were in prison in Northern Ireland at 30 June in each year from 1985 to 1990 found guilty of (i) membership of an illegal organisation (ii) possession of explosives, (iii) possion of ammunition, (iv) possession of firearms, (v) attempted murder and (vi) murder or as much information as is available to him;

(3) how many (a) men, (b) women and (c) juveniles charged with (i) murder, (ii) attempted murder, (iii) possession of firearms, (iv) possession of ammunition, (v) possession of explosives and (vi) membership of an illegal organisation, in each of the last five years and in this year to date have actually stood trial on those charges; and how many in each of those categories were (1) convicted (2) found not guilty and (3) convicted of a lesser charge.

Mr. Cope: I regret that in the time available it has not been possible to provide the information requested. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information is available to him as to in how many cases bail has been granted to (a) men and (b) women charged with (i) possession of firearms, (ii) attempted murder, (iii) possession of ammunition, (iv) possession of explosives, (v) membership of an illegal organisation ad (vi) murder in each of the last three years and in the current year to date.

Mr. Cope: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Police Complaints Commission

Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will arrange for copies of the annual report of the Independent Commission for Police Complaints for Northern Ireland to be laid before the House; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: The report has been laid today. This second report from the commission describes the work of the commission in the first calendar year of its existence. It clearly demonstrates the extent and importance of the work of a civilian body in overseeing the investigation of complaints against the police. It shows also that the commission has set for itself high standards of objectivity and fairness. That is entirely as it should be. I share with members of the commission the belief that arrangements to ensure that complaints are thoroughly and impartially investigated are essential if a police force is to have the trust and confidence of the community which it serves. I have no doubt that the commission, which is wholly independent of both Government and the RUC, will continue to make a significant contribution to the strengthening of relationships between police and public. In all its efforts to this end, it can be assured of my full support.

Autopsies

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many autopsies were carried out in Northern Ireland for the latest year for which information is available.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 20 July 1990]: The latest available information is as follows:

	Year ended	Number
State Pathology Service autopsies	31 December 1989	1,371
Hospital autopsies	31 December 1988	566

Needle Exchange Schemes

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many needle exchange schemes are currently operating in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 23 July 1990]: None.

Fair Employment Commission

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East of 18 July, he will seek an assurance from the Fair Employment Commission that it will publish information on the community composition from individual monitoring returns from employers before 15 October.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 24 July 1990]: The Fair Employment Commission has announced that it will make available monitoring information in respect of individual concerns following receipt of the 1991 monitoring returns.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the information on the Fair Employment Commission sought by the hon. Member for Londonderry, East in written questions answered on 18 July is held on a computer which may be used to extract such information by reference to geographical area or by post code.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 24 July 1990]: The Fair Employment Commission is in the process of developing its information systems. Information on registered concerns, including their geographical location, is currently held on a temporary computer system and is being validated for transfer to a permanent computer system in the autumn. It was therefore not possible readily to provide the information requested by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will request the Fair Employment commission to carry out an investigation into the community composition of the work force employed by the Inner City Trust, Londonderry.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 24 July 1990]: No. I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave on 10 July, vol. 176, column 156.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his office and the Northern Ireland Departments in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 24 July 1990]: The Government have continued to place a high priority on helping small businesses, through improvements to the business climate, through deregulation and other measures, and through specific programmes of support and assistance. The success of their policies is demonstrated by the latest statistics which show a record increase in the number of businesses registered for VAT in the United Kingdom, of 1,700 a week during 1989. Over the decade the overall increase has been 373,000. These figures include 1,100 net registrations for Northern Ireland in 1989 compared with 600 for 1988.

Government policy in relation to small businesses in Northern Ireland is administered through the Local Enterprise Development Unit (LEDU) which is funded by the Department of Economic Development. The table sets out a number of indicators comparing the results of LEDU's performance between 1988-89 and 1989-90.

	1988-89	1989-90
Jobs promoted	5,004	5,944
Cost per job	£4,804	£4,344
LEDU percentage contribution to project costs	32	31
Number of offers made	943	1,122
Grant commitments £ million	22·112	24·412

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the level of unemployment in the Amber Valley parliamentary constituency or the closest corresponding area, each year since 1975 up until the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Jackson: Unemployment figures by parliamentary constituency are available only from June 1983. The following information is available in the Library. The table shows the annual average number of unemployed claimants in the Amber Valley parliamentary constituency for the years 1983 to 1989.

The annual average number of unemployed claimants in the Amber Valley parliamentary constituency

Year	Number
[1]1983	3,475
1984	3,757
1985	4,167
1986	4,242
1987	3,841
1988	3,202
1989	2,333

[1] Average of the seven months June to December 1983

The comparison is affected by the changes in the coverage of the count that have occurred over the period. Comparable figures for earlier years are not available on the same geographical basis.

Women Workers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answer on 9 July, Official Report, columns 97-98, what comparable information he has on the attitudes of women without dependent children and men.

Mr. Forth: The 1984 British social attitudes survey asked all those in paid work (of at least 10 hours per week) to give their main reason for working.

The results for women without dependent children were as follows:

	Per cent.
Need for basic essentials	47
Enjoy working	12
To earn money of my own	12
To follow my career	10
To earn money to buy extras	9
Working is the normal thing to do	4
For the company of other people	3
For a change from my children or housework	1
Other reasons	2
The results for all men were:
Need money for basic essentials	71
Working is the normal thing to do	9
Enjoy working	7
To follow my career	5
To earn money of my own	4
To earn money to buy extras	2
For the company of other people	0
For a change from my children or housework	0
Other reasons	1

(Percentages total less than 100 per cent. due to rounding)

Sunday Trading Laws

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what he estimates would be the effect on employment of relaxing the present Sunday trading laws.

Mr. Forth: No such estimates are available.

Earnings

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table showing the increase in average weekly earnings of full-time adult male (a) manual workers in manufacturing and (b) non-manuals in the private sector, less manufacturing, together with his estimate of the increase in unit labour costs in manufacturing and non-manufacturing, respectively, since 1979.

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him in the last Session (Official Report, 1 November column 240) for the increase in earnings of manual workers in manufacturing. Figures are not readily available for non-manuals in the private sector less manufacturing and would involve disproportionate cost to compile.

Figures for unit labour costs in manufacturing are given in table 5·7 of Employment Gazette. Unit labour costs in non-manufacturing would involve disproportionate cost to compile.

Training Expenditure

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the contribution which an increase in expenditure on training would make to reducing the trade deficit in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Jackson: I am replying as training is a matter for my Department.

The existing substantial investment by employers and Government in training makes an important contribution to Britain's competitiveness, but the crucial factor in creating a world-class work force is the effectiveness of that investment.

Technical and Vocational Education Initiative

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps have been taken by his Department to maximise the investment in the technical and vocational educational initiative spent on capital products.

Mr. Jackson: The aim of the technical and vocational education initiative (TVEI) is to prepare young people aged 24 to 18 for the demands of working life. Funds are used to provide additional teaching and other posts, INSET training, curriculum development, work experience, flexible learning methods etc, not simply capital equipment.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report the planned expenditure on technical and vocational education initiative in St. Helens in each of the next five years.

Mr. Jackson: The planned expenditure on TVEI in St. Helens in the financial year 1990-91 is £238,000. Future years' expenditure will depend upon resources available, although the Government are committed to spending £900 million over the period of TVEI extension and each authority will receive its full share over the life of its project.

Careers and Occupational Information Centre

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement about the future of the careers and occupational information centre.

Mr. Howard: I want to ensure that COIC continues to provide its existing or a better level of service to its customers, including young people in schools and people with special needs, in the most efficient and cost-effective manner.

I have therefore decided to commission a feasibility study to consider the options for the future of COIC, including the options for transferring the centre to the private sector, to assess their financial and other implications and to make recommendations.

I shall consider the results of the feasibility study in the light of the results of my Department's internal review of careers guidance, which was announced on 10 May.

Efficiency Scrutiny

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he intends to publish the report of the efficiency scrutiny of take-up of his Department's programmes.

Mr. Howard: I have today placed copies of the report on the scrutiny of take-up of Employment Department programmes in the Libraries of this House and of another place. Copies of the report have also been sent to members of the Select Committee on Employment. Further copies are available on request from my Department.

My predecessor set up the scrutiny because of his concern—which was shared by the Select Committee on Employment and other hon. Members—about the failure of a significant number of long-term unemployed people to take up places on our progammes after they had expressed an interest in doing so and the tendency of others to leave programmes prematurely after very brief participation. The scrutiny team was asked to recommend cost-effective methods of substantially increasing both levels of take-up and length of participation on the programmes most affected.

We welcome the scrutiny team's report, which we believe contains some practical suggestions to deal with the problem. Overall, we have accepted the great majority of the scrutiny report's 22 main recommendations in full or in part. Most people who enter our programmes for the long-term unemployed are referred by the employment service, in particular as a result of restart interviews. The majority of the recommendations in the scrutiny report are therefore addressed to the employment service. Since receiving the report, we have already taken a number of important steps to implement the main recommendations.

First, we announced a package of measure to improve the employment service's claimant advice functions. These include particularly the introduction of "back to work" plans recording specific agreed action at the end of advisory interviews which can be followed up on a regular basis; the adoption of a caseload approach to claimant advice, so that unemployed people are, where possible, seen and followed up by the same person; and systematic follow-up of everyone who agrees at a restart interview to go to a place on one of the Department's programmes but fails to attend.

Secondly, we have introduced an intensive programme of guidance and advice over a six-week period for the minority of unemployed people who are still unemployed after two years, designed to put them back on the road to a job.

Thirdly, we have announced that we plan to require attendance at a restart course for those who have been unemployed for two years or more and who at subsequent restart interviews refuse to participate in any of my Department's employment and training programmes. Our experience suggests that many people who are initially reluctant to go on these courses find that in fact the courses give them positive support and help in getting back into work. We shall continue to keep the situation in this area under review.

Other recommendations in the report are directed to the Training Agency and TECs or more generally at the way the Department organises its programmes. We are taking steps to implement these, including the following action:

in response to the report's recommendation that we should reorganise the way in which we deliver assessment services for long-term unemployed people, we have decided that TECs should be encouraged to develop the services that they are offering, in close co-operation with the employment service. We shall be asking them to explore ways of improving and making more widely available the kind of assessment and action planning which now takes place within ET; encouraging TECs and the employment service to use the new programme flexibilities which are available to TECs and other programme development funds to adjust our programmes to meet the needs of as wide a range of long-term unemployed people as possible. This is in response to the report's recommendation that Ministers should consider whether the present range of programmes is adequate to meet the needs of all long-term unemployed people; drawing to the attention of TECs those recommendations which are aimed at them, and encouraging the closest possible co-operation between TECs and the employment service to ensure that we maximise the contribution that each can make to helping long-term unemployed people.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will be taking similar action in Scotland in respect of local enterprise companies.

This series of measures should have a significant impact on improving take-up of our programmes and reducing drop-out. We shall monitor this closely. But it is important to keep the problem in perspective. Existing levels of take up on employment training, for example, are already an improvement on previous programmes and, on the scrutiny's own findings, well ahead of performance in those other countries on which the scrutiny could obtain information. The measures that we are now putting in place will enable us to do even better.

Enterprise Allowance

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Forth: I am pleased to announce that I have recently invited a small number of operational TECs to pilot measures aimed at helping EAS participants to become better prepared for running their own businesses. Pilots will include a variety of elements such as preparation of business plans, business assessment and additional business training and counselling.

Employment Rehabilitation Service

Mr. Kirkhope: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he is now able to make a statement on plans to transfer the employment rehabilitation service to the employment service.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. and learned Friend has decided that the employment rehabilitation service will transfer from the Training Agency to the employment service on 1 August 1990 where it will be located alongside the other specialist disability services. Longer-term issues about the organisation of employment assessment and rehabilitation are discussed in the consultative document, "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities", which was published on 29 June and on which comments are invited by 31 December.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Parental Encouragement

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance he gives to local education authorities regarding the acceptance of parental encouragement and assistance regarding pupils' school work; and what representations he has received on this subject.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend gives no general guidance to local education authorities on these matters. As far as assistance with pupils' course work for GCSE examinations is concerned, teachers are required in submitting course work to certify that the work is that of the candidate. My right hon. Friend from time to time receives correspondence on this issue.

School Holidays

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in table form the information available to him on the dates and lengths of the school holidays taken in each of the G7 countries including the United Kingdom in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Fallon: The Department does not collect information on the dates of school holidays in England. Powers to determine the dates of school terms and holidays rest with the LEA in the case of county and controlled schools and with the governors of aided, special agreement and grant-maintained schools. The Department does not collect information about the dates of school terms and length of holidays in other countries.

Bogus Degrees

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of each occasion when Her Majesty's inspectors have investigated claims made under the bogus degree legislation involving the names of the institutions, the circumstances in which the investigations came to be made, the results of the investigations, the cost of each; and by whom these costs were borne.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I assume the hon. Member's interest is in the investigation of potentially fraudulent claims caught within the remit of the bogus degree legislation. It is not Her Majesty's inspectors' responsibility to investigate such claims. Under section 215(1) it is the duty of every local weights and measures authority to enforce the provisions of section 214 of the Act within their area.

University Students

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list for each university (a) the total fee support grant allocated by the Universities Funding Council, (b) the number of part-time students and (c) the number of self-financing students, for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The shift in public funding of universities from the block grant to the fee paid as part of the mandatory awards arrangements relates to home and EC award holders on designated courses. The following table shows the element in the Universities Funding Council block grants to universities for academic year 1990-91 based on the number of self-financing full-time and part-time students on designated and other courses. It is for the universities themselves to set fee levels, and to dispose of their block grant and fee income as they judge best. The table also shows total numbers of university part-time home and overseas students in 1988-89.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will update the table given in his answer to the hon. Member for Blackburn, Official Report, 8

February, columns 749-52, giving the latest available information in respect of each city technology college or proposed and planned city technology college.

Mr. MacGregor: The table covers agreed, announced and formally proposed CTCs in England.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what amount of earmarked annual grant or related payments he has agreed to pay for the school year beginning in September for each city technology college or city college for technology and the arts; and for what purposes each element of earmarked annual grant has been approved.

Mr. MacGregor: The figures relating to earmarked annual grant for the academic year beginning September 1990 have not yet been agreed. Earmarked grants are the subject of specific bids for the colleges and relate to specific expenditure on:

(a) consumables—the purchase, during the start-up period only, of a basic stock of library and text books, courseware, stationery and other consumable materials;
(b) school meals—the provision of free meals for pupils who qualify, a subsidy in respect of those pupils who do not, and supervision costs;
(c) pupil support—to cover the costs of school uniforms and school transport for disadvantaged pupils;
(d) IT development—software and courseware for the incorporation and exploitation of IT throughout the curriculum and in the administration of the College; and
(e) staff development—to provide for in-service training and curriculum development needs arising from the curriculum in CTCs.

Because these grants are the subject of bids from the colleges themselves, I am unable to provide figures for the academic year 1990-91.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what costs, within the terms of paragraph 7 of the model city technology college funding agreement, the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college trust will incur in acquiring a leasehold on the sites and premises of the present Haberdashers' Aske's schools in Deptford for the purposes of establishing a city technology college.

Mr. MacGregor: Within the terms of paragraph 7 of the model funding agreement that I placed in the House of Commons Library last summer, the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college trust will contribute to total capital expenditure of the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college, the capitalised value of the leasehold of the sites and premises for the college. It is the intention of the Haberdashers' Company that this asset will be transferred to the trust for this purpose at no cost.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what amount of annual per capita grant or related revenue costs he has agreed to pay for the school year beginning in September for each city technology college or city college for technology and the arts; what unit of cost per pupil has been used in calculating the amount of such payments; and what enhancement of annual per capita grant has been allowed under the terms of paragraph 11 of the model funding agreement.

Mr. MacGregor: The annual per capita grant (APG) for the school year beginning September 1990 for the two CTCs in or near London—Dartford and Croydon—this September has not yet been determined. The APGs for the five CTCs that will be operating outside London are as follows:

Kingshurst	1,820,602
Djanogly, Nottingham	1,397,707
Macmillan College, Teesside	1,234,019
Bradford	[1]934,689
Gateshead	[1]862,550

[1] Denotes those colleges opening this September.

The APG of CTCs outside London is determined by reference to the unit costs (£2,075 for pupils aged 11 to 16, £3,320 for those over 16 in 1990-91) in a group of 24 LEAs which maintain schools in similar areas to CTCs. In addition, provision is made for the college's administration costs and for diseconomies of scale during the start-up period, reflecting good practice in respect of new LEA-maintained schools.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what payments have been made by his Department to date to the Haberdashers' Company; what other costs have been incurred by his Department in connection with preparations for the establishment of a Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college; and what have been the specific purposes for which these costs have been incurred.

Mr. MacGregor: The following payments have been made to the Haberdashers' Company in connection with preparations for the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college.

Project Director's salary	24,824
Educational adviser's fees	6,000
Building feasibility studies	19,341
Publications	15,645

In addition, the Department's staffing costs to support this project are estimated to be £22,958.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply of 11 July, Official Report, column 232, whether any scheme of government for the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college approved by him, under the terms of the model funding agreement paragraph 21, will also constitute the college as a single school with two single-sex departments.

Mr. MacGregor: I will need to assure myself that the terms of the scheme of government of the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college are compatible with the establishment of a single city technology college with two single-sex departments.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the names of the persons proposed by him and the Haberdashers' Company to serve as primary members of the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college trust; and when that trust will be established.

Mr. MacGregor: I expect that the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college trust will be formed this summer. I have yet to agree the necessary articles and memorandum of association, including the names of the Haberdashers' Company nominees. I have nominated Miss Sheila Needham to serve on the trust when this is established.

Pay Statistics

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list figures comparing the average pay for graduate employees and the average pay for polytechnic lecturers (a) upon recruitment, (b) at age 25 years, (c) at age 30 years, (d) at age 35 years and (e) at age 40 years.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Estimates of annual graduate[1] gross earnings for 1990[2] are shown in the table:

Age band	Men (£)	Men and women (£)
20 to 24	12,320	11,440
25 to 29	15,849	14,802
30 to 39	23,419	21,017
40 to 49	28,319	24,055
All (20 to 69)	23,263	20,070

[1] Coverage of graduates excludes unemployed personnel. It is restricted to those with first degrees and excludes those with higher degrees.

[2] Based on the OPCS general household survey (1987) and updated to 1990 using th annual growth in the average earnings index. This source yields data for age bands rather than age points. For 1990, a growth of 9·5 per cent. has been assumed.

Note: Information about the average pay of polytechnic lecturers at age points is not available in the form requested. Polytechnic lecturers are paid on a 14-point scale from £9,117 to £16,521; senior lecturers on a 9-point scale from £15,954 to £20,511; Principal lecturers/readers on 9-point scale from £19,941 to £24,501. The pay of heads of Department ranges from £24,000 to £28,263 according to grade. But pay scales are not strictly comparable with data for gross earnings.

Students (Financial Management)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice on financial maintenance his Department gives to students applying for courses leading to qualifications registered under the Professions Supplementary to Medicine Act 1960.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Students on designated courses leading to certain of these qualifications may be eligible for an award under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations in force at the time of their application, provided that they are not in receipt of a bursary or award made under the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968. My Department publishes annually a brief guide entitled "Grants to Students" which gives general information on eligibility for and calculation of grants under the regulations.

Students on certain courses may also be eligible for a loan under the Education (Student Loans) Regulations 1990 recently approved by Parliament. My Department has issued a leaflet entitled "The Student Top-up Loan Scheme" which gives advice to students on eligibility for loans and their terms and we will shortly publish more detailed guidance in a booklet "Loans to Students".

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many copies of (a) "Grant Maintained Schools: Questions Parents Ask", and (b) "School Governors, How to Become a Grant Maintained School," have been printed; what was the cost; to whom they have been sent; and what was the cost of distribution.

Mr. MacGregor: There have been two editions of "School Governors: How to Become a Grant-Maintained School": 100,000 copies of the first edition were printed at a cost of £22,750; 50,000 copies of the second edition were printed at a cost of £12,690. Copies of the first edition were sent to all maintained schools: it was not the practice at that time to keep detailed postage costs for each publication separately. It cost £870 to post an initial distribution of the second edition to all maintained secondary schools.

A total of 240,000 copies of "Grant-Maintained Schools: Questions Parents Ask" have been printed at a cost of £28,600. It cost £3,675 to post an initial distribution to all schools which are eligible for grant-maintained status.

As is generally the case with DES publications, initial copies of "Questions Parents Ask" and of both editions of "How to become a Grant-Maintained School" were sent for information to major organisations with an interest in the subject, including the local authority associations, every chief education officer in England and the teacher unions.

European Further Education Colleges

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what grant mechanisms exist for students who wish to attend further education colleges in the European Community after 1992.

Mr. Eggar: Mandatory awards are available to eligible students from England and Wales attending first degree and designated comparable courses provided by United Kingdom institutions which include a period of study abroad. Loans are to be available on the same basis. Certain postgraduate awards are tenable at institutions abroad, including the College of Europe and the European University Institute. Local education authorities may make discretionary awards to students following other further and higher education courses abroad.

European Community programmes—ERASMUS, LINGUA, COMMETT—also assist United Kingdom students who wish to follow part of their higher education courses in other member states.

In accordance with the treaty of Rome, United Kingdom students taking up places in further and higher education institutions in other member states can have their tuition costs met in full or in part by the relevant authorities, on the same basis as nationals of the state concerned.

Reading Standards

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he has taken to establish facts about reading standards among seven-year-olds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: At my request the Department has sought evidence from a number of local education authorities mentioned in connection with recent reports of falling reading standards among seven-year-olds. Those inquiries have revealed that LEAs do not at present have consistent policies of testing reading skills, nor employ comparable tests. The information made available to my officials in the course of their inquiries is accordingly inadequate either to substantiate or to disprove the claim of a fall in national standards. I will continue to endeavour to get full responses from the LEAs concerned.

The national curriculum will remedy the current lack of national information about reading skills. Under the assessment arrangements of the national curriculum, the reading skills of all pupils will be assessed against clearly defined statutory criteria at the ages of seven, 11, 14 and 16. The first national assessment of seven-year-olds will be in 1991 and take place annually thereafter. These assessments will provide solid and comprehensive national data about pupils' reading standards for the first time in our history.

In the meantime, I am taking action on two fronts:

(a) I am inviting Her Majesty's inspectorate to focus on the teaching of reading in their inspections of primary schools next term, and to report their findings to me; and

(b) I have asked the School Examinations and Assessment Council (SEAC) to survey the available LEA evidence about the reading levels of seven-year-olds now and over recent years and to advise me further, in the light of this evidence, on levels of reading skills on the eve of the implementation of the national curriculum and of any recent trends in those standards.

Core Subjects (Assessment)

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the statutory arrangements for the assessment of seven-year-olds in the core subjects from 1991.

Mr. MacGregor: In the light of consultations on a draft issued by the Department in May, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I are publishing today orders under section 4(2)(c) of the Education Reform Act 1988 prescribing the arrangements for the first national assessments in England and Wales of seven-year-olds in the core subjects in 1991. Accompanying explanatory circulars are also being issued today. I am arranging for copies of these documents to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Copies are also being sent to all local education authorities and to all schools in England and Wales and to other interested bodies.

The orders provide that the assessment of seven-year-olds in the core subjects should combine both mandatory, end of key stage standard assessment tasks (SATs) and teachers' own judgments ("teacher assessments") based on ordinary classroom work over the course of key stage 1 of the national curriculum. They also prescribe standard rules for determining each pupil's overall level of attainment in these subjects and in their constituent profile components from the teacher assessments and SATs.

The orders do not, however, prescribe the nature of SATs themselves, or of the teacher assessments. My right hon. Friend and I will settle these in the light of the evaluation by the School Examinations and Assessment Council (SEAC) of this summer's pilot assessments of seven-year-olds in the core subjects in a 2 per cent. sample of primary schools nationwide; and of wider consultation we are undertaking on them. A key part of that evaluation will be to identify approaches to the conduct of teacher assessments and SATs which are manageable for teachers, apt for pupils and rigorous as assessments. I expect SEAC to report the results of the evaluation to me and to my right hon. Friend in the autumn.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kashmir

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of Kashmir.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Member to the remarks my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs made on this subject on 23 July at columns 209-12.

Afghanistan

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives he intends to take in the United Nations Security Council to seek resolution of the continuing conflict in Afghanistan.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None. We are glad to welcome the progress being made in talks between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics about the possibilities for a political settlement.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals Her Majesty's Government intend to put to the fourth quinquennial review conference of the non-proliferation treaty under article X of the treaty in regard to its extension.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 9 May at column 181.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the last meeting at ministerial level was between the United Kingdom and (a) France and (b) China at which the possibility of the latter two countries joining the 1968 nuclear non-proliferation treaty was discussed.

Mr. Waldegrave: Ministers discuss non-proliferation matters with France and China when appropriate opportunities arise.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the participation of France and China at the fourth quinquennial review conference of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: France and China have both announced their intention to attend the non-proliferation treaty review conference as observers.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department was represented at the colloquium "Non-Proliferation in a Disarming World: Prospects for the 1990s" held in Geneva on 20 and 21 June.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes—by the leader of the United Kingdom delegation to the conference on disarmament in Geneva.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department received an invitation to attend the conference on the proliferation of nuclear and chemical weapons in London on 14 and 15 July.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the three nuclear non-proliferation treaty depository powers have had any meetings with the secretariat of the Latin American non-proliferation organisation—Opanal—in preparation for the fourth review conference of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: The United Kingdom has had no such meetings; we cannot say whether the United States or Soviet Union have done so.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what actions have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to implement the recommendations set out in the final document of the third nuclear non-proliferation treaty review conference (NPT/Conf. III/64/I, annex I) in regard to (a) active involvement of treaty nuclear weapons states in nuclear disarmament negotiations, (b) resumption of negotiations in trilateral and multilateral form towards a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty and (c) support for an international plutonium storage regime under international safeguards.

Mr. Waldegrave: (a) We have fully supported both the 1987 INF agreement, and the current United States/Soviet START negotiations. We and our NATO allies confirmed at the London summit that negotiations for reductions in United States and Soviet short-range nuclear forces (SNF) in Europe should begin once a CFE agreement is signed. NATO is also prepared to eliminate all its nuclear artillery shells from Europe, on the basis of reciprocal action by the Soviet Union.

(b) For the foreseeable future, there will be a continuing requirement to test our nuclear weapons to ensure that they remain effective and up-to-date. A comprehensive test ban treaty is therefore a long-term goal, progress to which can be made only on a step-by-step basis.

(c) When the form that such a regime might take was discussed internationally several years ago, it was not possible to reach a consensus. We are prepared to contribute fully to any further discussion.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has concerning free trade in nuclear materials between any country that is a member of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: Under article IV of the NPT, all parties

"undertake to facilitate, and have the right to participate in, the fullest possible exchange of equipment, materials and scientific and technological information for the peaceful purposes of nuclear energy".

We fully observe our obligations under the treaty.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the extent of Her Majesty's Government's obligations and duties as a depository power under the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to articles VIII, IX and XI of the non-proliferation treaty.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many copies of the information briefing note on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, produced in June, have been printed; to what parties it has been distributed; and at what cost.

Mr. Waldegrave: A total of 4,083 copies of the background brief were produced. They were distributed to a wide range of academic and other organisations abroad and in the United Kingdom. The document was prepared by officials of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office as part of their normal duties, and it is not possible to allocate an individual cost to its production.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the dates on which the European political co-operation committee's working group on nuclear non-proliferation has met this year and the scheduled dates for any further meetings.

Mr. Waldegrave: The non-proliferation working group met on 31 January to 1 February, 3 to 4 April, and 6 July. One further meeting will take place later this year.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the dates of those occasions on which his Department has consulted the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on nuclear non-proliferation since October 1985.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have consulted the other depository powers of the non-proliferation treaty on numerous occasions.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will state (a) the membership and (b) the remit, of the three committees that will be formed at the non-proliferation treaty fourth review conference.

Mr. Waldegrave: Under the draft rules of procedure for the review conference, agreed at the third session of the preparatory committee, each state party to the treaty participating in the conference may be represented by one representative on each main committee. It may assign to these committees such alternate representatives and advisers as may be required. The remit of the committees will be to consider certain items of relevance to the operation of the NPT over the past five years; other items will be considered in the plenary.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration he has given to the implications for (i) the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and (ii) the necessary level of a British minimum nuclear deterrent, of (a) the strategic defence initiative and (b) any British involvement in it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The strategic defence initiative is a research programme designed to investigate the feasibility of strategic defences. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and President Reagan agreed in 1984, the overall aim of SDI is to enhance, and not to undermine deterrence. We consider it could contribute to world security and stability.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the three depository powers under the nuclear non-proliferation treaty are willing to accept on-site inspection to verify a ban on all nuclear testing.

Mr. Waldegrave: For the foreseeable future, our security will depend on deterrence based in part on the possession of nuclear weapons. That will mean a continuing requirement to test our nuclear weapons in order to ensure that they remain effective and up to date. A comprehensive test ban therefore remains a long-term goal, progress to which will be made only on a step-by-step basis. We cannot comment on the views of the other depositories on this subject.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to discuss with Commonwealth countries the issues to be raised in the fourth review conference of the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to breaches of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty recorded by monitoring organisations regarding the supply of nuclear material to other states without the required notification in each of the last five years and as to the states involved and the materials in each case.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have received any notification from any party to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty under article VIII of the treaty to amend it; and what information he has as to whether any such notification of amendments has been submitted to the other two depository states to the treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are not aware of any notification of proposed amendments.

Nuclear Submarines

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), Official Report, 13 June, column 262, if he will make a statement on the implications for United Kingdom foreign policy of the transfer of nuclear submarines to India from the Soviet Union.

Mr. Waldegrave: One nuclear-powered submarine has been leased to the Indian navy by the Soviet Union. We understand that the special fissionable material involved has remained under Soviet control. This seems to present no specific issues in relation to United Kingdom foreign policy.

EC Legislation

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if European Community legislation applies to (a) the Azores, (b) Ceuta, (c) Melilla and (d) Diego Garcia.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Community legislation applies in the Azores and in Ceuta and Melilla, subject to derogations pursuant to the Act of Spanish and Portuguese Accession. Community legislation does not apply in Diego Garcia, though the British Indian Ocean Territory is associated with the Community under the provisions of part IV of the EEC treaty and Council decision 86/283/EEC.

Iraq and Libya (Nuclear Arms)

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his oral reply to the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), Official Report, 13 June, column 272, if he will publish the evidence on which he based his assessment that Iraq and Libya are heading towards having a nuclear arsenal.

Mr. Waldegrave: This was the assessment of my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans). My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs agreed with his second point—that we should be encouraging world opinion to bring about peace in the middle east.

United Nations Declarations

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of United Nations declarations 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 2625 (XX) of 24 October 1970.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The United Kingdom abstained with other western countries on the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples of 1960, largely because it envisaged independence as the only possible outcome of self-determination. The United Kingdom joined in supporting the declaration on principles of international law concerning friendly relations with co-operation among states in accordance with the charter of the United Nations, of 1970, and continues to support it.

Visas (Poland)

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding Government policy on requiring visa applications from Polish citizens visiting the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In accordance with the provisions of the immigration rules (HC 251) any Polish citizen wishing to visit the United Kingdom must first make an application for a visa at a British embassy, high commission or consulate.

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the length of time to process a visa application by the British embassy in Warsaw.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Private applications for visit visas, once lodged with the embassy, are processed the same day.

We aim to process other types of applications normally within seven working days (short-term official) and one month (long-term and multiple-entry).

Dalai Lama

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met representatives of the Dalai Lama; and what was discussed.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has had no such meeting.

Cambodia

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement on the British Government's policy towards Cambodia, following the latest meeting of the five permanent members of the Security Council.

Mr. Hurd: We welcome the American decision to open a dialogue with Vietnam on Cambodia. We share the United States Government's determination to do all that we can to prevent the Khmer Rouge from returning to power by force of arms. Our common objective is to create the conditions to enable the Cambodian people to elect a Government, free from the fear of foreign invasion, civil war or Khmer Rouge atrocities. We and our EC partners were already reviewing our policy towards Cambodia's representation at the United Nations. Indeed, six months ago at the EC-ASEAN ministerial meeting at Kuching we and our EC partners warned the ASEAN Foreign Ministers that we would be re-examining this particular question very closely before the 1990 UNGA. My noble Friend the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, made clear in another place on 5 February this year that the occupation of the seat would be a key factor in the peace process. On 30 April, replying to a question by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs told the House that we would have to look closely at the question of Cambodia's seat at the United Nations in the context of current diplomatic activity aimed at achieving a peaceful settlement. I can now state that we do not want the coalition of which the Khmer Rouge is a member to continue to occupy Cambodia's United Nations seat. Consultations with EC partners and other interested countries on the handling of this question will continue.

With the other permanent members of the UN Security Council, we continue to work hard to achieve a comprehensive political settlement. At their latest meeting on 16-17 July, the Permanent Five made significant progress on two key elements of a solution based on an enhanced UN role: transitional arrangements regarding the administration of Cambodia during the pre-election period: and military arrangements. They agreed to accelerate their work in the remaining three areas (free and fair elections, safeguarding of human rights and international guarantees) which were identified in their earlier meeting in New York on 25-26 May as essential aspects of a comprehensive political settlement. The Five are due to hold their next meeting in New York on 27-28 August.

I have placed a copy of the summary of conclusions of the 16-17 July meeting in the House of Commons Library.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the achievements of (a) his policies and (b) his Department in helping small businesses over the last 12 months as against the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 24 July]: In 1989-90 both wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office continued to place a part of their requirements for goods and services with small businesses. In the Diplomatic Wing the value of this business over the last two years was:

	£ million	Percentage of expenditure
1989-90	32·80	22·5

The DW director of purchasing disseminates to purchasing departments information and guidance on procurement from small firms. He ensures that, whenever possible, such firms are included in invitations to tender and that they are awarded contracts if their offer is the best on a value-for-money basis.

The ODA uses procurement agencies to undertake purchasing and supply on behalf of recipient governments in developing countries. Its register of agents includes several small businesses. ODA also encourages small firms to compete for aid-financed consultancy contracts overseas.

In line with the BOTB forward plan, diplomatic service posts put a particular emphasis on supporting small and medium-sized businesses through a wide range of export promotion services. Performance indicators for these activities do not distinguish company size.

Ivory

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply of 5 June, Official Report, column 472, if he will give details of licences issued for the export of ivory since 18 May.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 10 July 1990]: Between 18 May 1990 and 7 July 1990 the Hong Kong authorities issued 15 export licences as follows:

Licence(s)	Quantity (KG)	Description	Destination
8	5,222·1	Ivory scrap	China
1	156·5	Worked ivory	Mexico
3	112·6	Worked ivory	Andorra
1	14	Worked ivory (personal effect)	Taiwan
1	8	Worked ivory (pre-convention)	Australia
14

In addition, one export licence was issued for 6·1 kg of worked ivory personal effects destined for United Kingdom. This licence was issued on 5 July 1990, but expired on 16 July 1990 without being collected by the applicant.

DEFENCE

Local Government Finance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the number of service men counted as resident in the United Kingdom for poll tax purposes;

(2) where the service men are counted as resident in the United Kingdom for poll tax purposes located by base, county, and parliamentary constituency.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No record is held of this information, which could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations have taken place between local authorities and his Department on future poll tax payments by service men.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Ministry of Defence officials have met local authority representatives on a number of occasions to discuss various matters relating to the community charge. At a local level, every service unit has appointed an officer responsible for liaison with community charge registration officers.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) pursuant to his oral reply to the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), Official Report, 3 April, column 1020, which are the signatories of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty who appear to have embarked on an attempt to achieve nuclear technology, to which he referred;

(2) pursuant to the answers to the hon. Members for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce), Official Report, 15 May, columns 730 and 733, if he will list the nations to which the hon. Member refers as trying to develop nuclear capability.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, to the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on 8 June 1990 at column 738.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the increases of radioactivity measured (i) above ground on the test site and (ii) off the test site, following each of the nuclear weapons tests listed in his reply to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), Official Report, 15 June, column 380.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As I said in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) on 5 April 1990 at column 834, there was a minor release of radioactivity from the Barnwell test conducted on 8 December 1989, but no radioactivity was detected beyond the boundaries of the test site; no radiological hazard was presented to members of the public nor to operatives on the test site. None of the other tests released any radioactivity.

Nuclear-armed Vessels

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer to the hon Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), Official Report, 11 June, column 41, if he will set out the restrictions placed on the deployment of United Kingdom nuclear-armed vessels when (a) in the territorial sea, and (b) in internal waters of (i) the Falkland Islands, (ii) South Georgia and South Sandwich Islands, (iii) the Cayman Islands, (iv) the Turks and Caicos Islands, (v) the British Virgin Islands and (vi) Anguilla and Montserrat.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom at all times complies with its obligation under the treaty of Tlatelolco not to deploy nuclear weapons in territories, including territorial and internal waters, which lie within the treaty's zone of application. It remains, however, our invariable practice to neither confirm nor deny the presence of nuclear weapons on board particular ships at particular times.

Trident Computer

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the Logica computer system for Trident to be fully operational.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The material control system in new facilities at AWE Aldermaston, for which Logica is developing software, is expected to become fully operational next year.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the consequences to the Trident programme of the failure of the Logica computer system to meet his Department's full software specification.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The material control system in the new facilities at AWE Aldermaston, for which Logica is developing software, is expected to become fully operational next year. Production of components for Trident warheads is not due to begin in the new facilities until 1992.

RAF Leuchars

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any intention of restarting night flying for search and rescue operations from RAF Leuchars.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Civilian Staff

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 12 June, Official Report, columns 142-43, whether he has any plans to provide other forms of training for civilian staff to assist them in the event that their services are no longer required.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Pre-retirement training is available to civilian staff of the Department. During their careers, MoD civil servants receive training in a wide variety of skills many of which are applicable to outside employment. Our plans for civilian training are kept under continuous review.

Childhood Leukaemia

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends to commission any studies into the incidence of childhood leukaemia in the Fareham and Gosport area.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The Ministry of Defence does not intend to commission a special study into the incidence of leukaemia in the Fareham and Gosport area.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies have been carried out into the incidence of childhood leukaemia in the Fareham and Gosport area.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The Ministry of Defence has not commissioned any studies into the incidence of childhood leukaemia in the Fareham and Gosport area.

Running Costs

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the average annual running costs of (a) each vessel listed on pages 53, 54 and 55 according to class, (b) each of the commando units and headquarters listed on page 55 according to type of unit, (c) each of the squadrons according to the type of equipment with which they are issued listed on pages 56, 59 and 60 and (d) each of the units and headquarters according to type of unit listed on page 57 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1990", Cm. 1022-1; and what methodology has been used to assess the average annual running costs of units.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the average annual running costs of (a) the Royal Aerospace Establishment, (b) the Admiralty Research Establishment, (c) the Royal Armament Research and Development Establishment, (d) the Royal Signals and Radar Establishment, (e) the Procurement Executive, (f) the Proof and Experimental Establishment, (g) the Sea Systems Controllerate, (h) the Air Systems Controllerate and (i) the Land Systems Controllerate.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: In 1989-90, the running costs of these organisations were as follows:

	£ million
Royal aerospace establishment	100
Admiralty research establishment	50
Royal armament research and development establishment	45
Royal signals and radar establishment	30
Sea systems controllerate	75
Land systems controllerate:
Proof and experimental establishments	15
Other land systems controllerate	30
Air systems controllerate	45
Other procurement executive	255
Total procurement executive	645

Running costs cover civilian pay, civilian and service travel and subsistence, utilities, services and general administrative expenses.

Equipment

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the approximate average annual cost of providing new equipment measured over the last 20 years to (a) each of the commando units and headquarters according to type of unit, listed on page 55, (b) each of the squadrons according to the type of equipment with which they are issued listed on pages 56, 59 and 60 and (c) each of the units and headquarters according to type of unit listed on page 57 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1990", Cm. 1022-1.

Mr. Carlisle: The information is not available without disproportionate effort.

Defence Industry

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration has been given to maintaining a defence industrial base that is capable of meeting the future requirements of the armed services in the course of his study of the options for change.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to the statement by the Secretary of State for Defence today on "Options for Change" in which he indicated that we would now be consulting the defence industries about our broad proposals.

Pre-release Training

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average amount of pre-release training that is provided to those service personnel who are eligible to receive it; and what is the average amount of expenditure on pre-release training for each service man or woman.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Service men and women are entitled to 28 days pre-release voluntary training; 31 per cent. of this training is conducted at Ministry of Defence resettlement centres, 12 per cent. on Ministry of Defence-sponsored courses at other centres and 57 per cent. during civilian attachments with outside organisations. The cost of this training currently averages £974 per person including in-house briefings.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total amount of expenditure on pre-release training in each year for the last 10 years; and whether he has any plans to extend the provision of pre-release training to civil staff.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Expenditure on pre-release training across the three services was not identified and aggregated prior to formation of the tri-service resettlement organisation on 2 January 1990. However, a study conducted in 1987 identified 1985-86 expenditure as being £11 million, and current year expenditure is anticipated to be £11·2 million. Expenditure on pre-release training has remained reasonably steady over the last 10 years.

Our plans for civilian training are kept under continuous review.

Expenditure Freeze

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what commitments were affected by the temporary bar he referred to on 18 June, Official Report, column 688; what was the planned expenditure of each of these; which commitments were not affected; on what date the bar came into force and what is its current status; and what effect it has had on (a) planned expenditure for the 1990-91 financial year, (b) recruitment of personnel, (c) retention of personnel, (d) the study of options for change, (e) future procurement plans, and (f) the size and structure of the defence industries.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A temporary bar on the placing of new defence contracts and entering into new commitments was introduced on 11 May 1990 and lifted on 2 July 1990. The bar was accompanied by a general ban on civilian recruitment. This ban was removed on 9 July.

The temporary bar has not altered the planned total of defence expenditure of 1990-91. Its purpose was to provide time for deciding on a number of short-term changes at the margin of the defence programme in order to remove forecast overspending on the planned budget.

Certain exceptions to the temporary bar and recruitment ban were permitted including commitments of high operational urgency, security measures and civilian recruitment in grades and geographical areas already experiencing recruiting difficulties. Armed forces recruiting was not restricted. It is estimated that the number of civilian vacancies left unfilled during the period of the general ban amounted to about 700. The number of contracts and purchases held back while the temporary bar was in force is large. Disproportionate effort would be required to provide a complete list.

"Options for Change" work continued in parallel with the temporary bar. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said on 18 June the selection of short-term measures to reduce expenditure sought to have regard to the picture emerging from "Options for Change".

In itself the temporary bar on new commitments, in force for only seven weeks, will not have had significant effects for personnel retention, future procurement plans or the size and structure of the defence industries. As regards decisions on savings to reduce expenditure in the current year an announcement has already been made—by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement on 18 June—that further work on the eighth batch of Tornado aircraft will not be authorised, and further announcements will be made shortly regarding additional savings identified during the temporary bar which are now judged to be necessary.

The temporary bar and the civilian recruitment ban have now been replaced by arrangements whereby all new commitments are scrutinised particularly closely to ensure that the defence cash limit for the current year is not breached.

Commercially Sensitive Information

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply of 6 July, Official Report, column 762, whether it is his policy to consult and reach agreement with defence companies on the nature and type of information that may be of commercial value to their competitors.

Mr. Alan Clark: Any information relating to commercial undertakings, processes or affairs given to the Ministry of Defence by companies is regarded as being in confidence unless the company concerned and the Ministry of Defence agree that it can be released.

Staff Establishments

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number, Civil Service grade or service rank, and salary of the staff establishments at (a) the Royal Aerospace Establishment, (b) the Admiralty Research Establishment, (c) the Royal Armament Research and Development Establishment, (d) the Royal Signals and Radar Establishment, (e) the Procurement Executive, (f) the Proof and Experimental Establishment, (g) the Sea Systems Controllerate, (h) the Air Systems Controllerate and (i) the Land Systems Controllerate.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The number of staff as at 1 April 1990 and pay bills for 1989-90 for these organisations were as follows:

	Civilians		Servicemen
	Number	Pay £ million	Numbers	Pay £ million
Royal aerospace establishment	4,878	66	83	2
Admiralty research establishment	2,898	41	100	2
Royal armament research and development establishment	2,365	35	208	4
Royal signals and radar establishment	1,593	24	29	1
Sea systems controllerate	3,784	64	533	10
Land systems controllerate:
Proof and experimental establishments	265	4	57	1
Other land systems controllerate	1,399	24	125	2
Air systems controllerate	1,743	35	127	2
Other procurement executive	12,764	200	245	5
Total procurement executive	31,689	493	1,507	29

A breakdown of staff numbers and pay by grade or service rank is available only at disproportionate cost.

Tristar

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has placed a contract for the maintenance of the Royal Air Force Tristar fleet.

Mr. Alan Clark: I am pleased to say that, following intense competition, a contract has been awarded to Marshall of Cambridge (Engineering) Limited. The contract, which is valued in excess of £30 million, covers scheduled and unscheduled maintenance of the aircraft, including repair and overhaul of components, over the next four years.

RAF St. Mawgan

Mr. Neale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further development is planned at RAF St. Mawgan.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: RAF St. Mawgan in Cornwall is a main operating base for Nimrod maritime patrol aircraft. There are no current plans for changes to that role.

The Ministry of Defence is additionally planning to develop at St. Mawgan a joint maritime communications centre (JMCC) in co-operation with the United States navy. This unit will provide an important link between United Kingdom and United States maritime forces and headquarters.

The JMCC will comprise a buried, hardened communications building approximately 70 metres square within the existing perimeter of RAF St. Mawgan. It will be integrated with the existing RAF fixed communications system, and will include two additional satellite ground terminals each approximately 3 metres in diameter, also sited within the station boundary. It has been agreed with the United States that the United Kingdom will finance and construct the JMCC building and the United States provides the operational equipment. Once fully operational, some 400 personnel will be associated with the JMCC, including both operational and support staff. Approximately half the operational staff will be provided by the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force and the remainder will be from the United States navy. Subject to consultation with the local planning authority, it is planned that major construction work on the JMCC will start in the middle of 1991, with the JMCC becoming operational in 1995.

Low Flying

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the regulations governing the practice of air-to-air refuelling in the United Kingdom low flying system; and what distinctions there are in the application of these regulations.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle [holding answer 18 July 1990]: There is no requirement to carry out air-to-air refuelling within the United Kingdom low flying system.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what action he is taking to put on-stream, low-flying flight simulators; how many the RAF currently have operational; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list by NATO air force, the number of low-flying flight simulators they have operational.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: There are currently no low-flying simulators in service with the RAF or, so far as we know, with other NATO air forces. With the introduction of more sophisticated types of simulators, such as the Harrier GR7 simulator in 1991, there will be a significant improvement in synthetic low-level training capability. However, even though advanced, this type of simulator will still be unable to replicate with sufficient fidelity the complex environment of a fast jet aircraft at low level. "Live" flying will continue to be necessary. Developments in simulator technology may eventually result in simulators with the requisite capacity, and we shall continue to keep abreast of developments in this area.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what savings would be made to his Department's budget from a 60 per cent. reduction in low-level military jet flights and their replacement by flight simulators.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The flight simulators currently in service with the Royal Air Force do not provide a realistic alternative to low-level training sorties.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the approved targets for toss and dive manoeuvres carried out by military jet aircraft.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The point raised is the subject of recommendations by the House of Commons Defence Committee whose report on low flying (HC 120) is currently being considered by the Government and to which a response will be made in due course.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Community Charge Rebates

117. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement regarding community charge rebates.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Department of Social Security is responsible for community charge benefit. Community charge benefit replaced rate rebates in April 1990 and will help about 10 million charge payers in Great Britain in 1990-91 at an estimated cost of around £2·5 billion. Community charge benefit is more generous than the rate rebate scheme it replaced. The lower benefit taper —15 per cent. in community charge benefit as opposed to 20 per cent. in the rate rebate scheme—will bring an estimated extra 800,000 claimants on to benefit at a cost of over £200 million. The doubled upper capital limit of £16,000 is estimated to increase the number of community charge benefit cases by 130,000 at a cost of £35 million.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of people in Scotland and the Borders currently receiving community charge rebates.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest information supplied by Borders regional council shows that just over 11,700 community charge rebates were in payment on 31 August 1989. Rebates to couples are counted as one rebate. The comparable figure for Scotland is about 900,000.

Leaflets

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the criteria by which it was decided to contract out the distribution of leaflet No. SFL10 rather than using his Department; and how much this has cost.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The distribution of leaflet SFL10 to the Department's local and regional offices was arranged by the Central Office of Information to ensure rapid delivery of the publication, because the information it contained had a limited lifespan. A total of 467,000 leaflets were distributed in this way at a cost of £5,130. Half these leaflets were then distributed locally to other advice agencies by the Department at no further identifiable cost. In addition a quantity was held at ISCO 5, a sheltered warehouse, permanently contracted to the Department for general print distribution, to service further demands from other organisations and individual members of the public. The cost of these individual requests cannot be separately identified.

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the cause of the insufficient supplies of leaflet SFL10 being available for community advice organisations for distribution to their clients.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We are not aware that insufficient supplies of SFL10 were available. The Department produced 600,000 copies to meet the likely demand for this short-life leaflet. A total of 450,000 were distributed to DSS local offices. They were either retained at local offices for direct distribution or were issued by them to local agencies and advice organisations.

Pensioners' Incomes

Sir Peter Hordern: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of those receiving state retirement pensions also receive other incomes; and what were the average earnings of pensioners in each of the last 10 years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The last available information shows that in 1987 more than 86 per cent. of pensioners had income from sources other than their retirement pension. The most recent figures of the average earnings of pensioners are set out in the table:

	Earnings[1] £
1979	63·00
1980	62·70
1981	67·30
1982	60·40
1983	76·10
1984	72·50
1985	69·10
1986	68·70
1987	84·26

[1]Average is for those individuals actually receiving earnings income.
Source: Family Expenditure Survey.

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the latest trend in pensioners' real incomes since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The average total net income of pensioners increased by over 31 per cent. in real terms between 1979 and 1987. This compares very favourably with the 3 per cent. real terms increase between 1974 and 1979.

Source: Family Expenditure Survey.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will list the cash and percentage changes in real income between (a) 1979 and 1987 and (b) 1983 and 1987 for all pensioners units, single pensioners and pensioner couples, in each case breaking down the figures by decile group;

(2) if he will list (a) the percentage and (b) the cash changes in pensioners' incomes by decile group for the period 1983 to 1987.

(2) if he will indicate the breakdown of the 17 per cent. real increase in the net income of the lowest quintile of pensioners since 1979; if he will indicate what percentage is due to the (a) basic state retirement pension, (b) SERPS, (c) occupational pensions, (d) savings and interest, (e) increased take-up of disability benefits and (f) other sources of income; and if he will give a similar breakdown for each of the four quintiles.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 8 March 1990]: The information requested is set out in the tables. The source of the data is the family expenditure survey. It is not possible from this source to identify payments of additional pension from the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Source: Family Expenditure Survey.
All cash figures are £s per week at 1987 prices.
In common with all other surveys, the family expenditure survey draws information from a random sample of the population. This means that the FES will occasionally include some individuals whose weekly incomes are considerably higher or lower than those of the remainder of their quintile. The unrepresentative income of such individuals may cause wide swings in the figures particularly in year-to-year comparisons and when disaggregated into quintiles. In general, when viewed over the long term, the data provide a reliable indication of the movement in average weekly income.

Pensioners' Charter

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will meet representatives of retirement pensioners' organisations to discuss the pensioners' charter; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Ministers have met pensioners' groups twice during the last two months to discuss a range of issues of concern to them and to listen to their views.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, further to the reply to the hon. Member for Preston of 7 March, Official Report, column 682, on recipients of invalid care allowance who also receive income support, if he will publish the corrected figures provided in a letter to the hon. Member by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The corrected figure of the number of recipients of invalid care allowance who also received income support in May 1988, which I provided in a letter to the hon. Member, is 14,000.

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to the reply of 7 March, Official Report, column 682, on recipients of invalid care allowance who also receive income support, what are the corresponding figures for May 1989.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The figures requested have been published in "Income Support Statistics Annual Inquiry May 1989", a copy of which is in the Library.

Benefit Claimants

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average length of time an individual claimant has to wait for a decision on their claim for benefit from an adjudication officer or tribunal hearing from the time that individual becomes unemployed.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The average time taken to clear benefit claims is calculated by reference to the date a claim is received rather than from the date of unemployment and the date a decision is made by the adjudication officer. The two main benefits concerned are unemployment benefit and income support. The latest available information from 31 May 1990 is as follows:

Benefit	Average clearance time
Income support	4·6 days

Information is not available in the form requested for claims to unemployment benefit or for decisions made by social security appeals tribunals and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Pensioners

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) male and (b) female pensioners there are in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest available figures show that in March 1989 there were 3·49 million male pensioners and 6·55 million female pensioners receiving retirement pension in the United Kingdom.
(Source: retirement pension statistics March 1989.)

Earnings

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) men and (b) women in each region earn below the national insurance threshold; and how many are between the upper and lower earnings limits.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The average number of employees earning between the lower and upper earnings limits in any week in 1990-91 is approximately

Men 8·6 million
Women 8·0 million

Detailed information on the numbers earning below the lower earnings limit is not available. It is estimated, however, that in any week about 2·75 million employees earn less than the lower earnings limit, of whom about one quarter are men. Up to 0·5 million of these people would be only temporarily below the lower earnings limit by virtue of a reduction in their normal earnings—for example, due to sickness.

The figures are for employees in Great Britain. Information on a regional basis is not available.

McKiernon Judgment

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people suffering from occupational deafness and asthma, whose cases were affected by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Mr. Frank McKiernon, have benefited or will benefit from the decision; how many such people will have lost their entitlement in consequence of the action he took retrospectively to change the law; and what is the estimated total saving to his Department from the action he took.

Mr. Scott: Information on those who have benefited from the Court of Appeal decision is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The intention of the legislation in schedule 6 paragraph 4 of the Social Security Act 1990 is that any entitlements conditional upon the court's judgment should be discontinued once the Act is in force. Were it not for this legislation, it is estimated that a trawl of past cases might have increased benefit expenditure by up to £100 million.

Benefits

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 28 June, Official Report, columns 353-56, on the value of benefits, if he will publish the corrected figures for the benefits in relation to earnings, including the period November 1979 to April 1990.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regret the error in the earlier reply. This arose from the use of the incorrect category of workers for the gross earnings figures. The corrected figures are in the table. It is not possible to provide the ratio of benefits to gross earnings for April 1990 because the 1990 new earnings survey is not yet available. The corrections also apply to the answer given to the hon. Member on 20 December 1989 at columns 300-02.

Fylde Local Office

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the number of claims for each of the last 12 months made to the Department of Social Security, Fylde.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The number of claims for family credit received by the family credit unit at North Fylde central office is in the table:

	Claims
1989
July	66,075
August	62,397
September	80,792
October	80,670
November	85,530
December	70,996

January	78,122
February	76,049
March	89,088
April	77,080
May	93,310
June	70,101

Notes:
1. The figures are for the 4 or 5 weeks ending on the last Friday of the month.
2. The figures for claims received include those made to renew existing awards and those made more than 4 weeks before the expiry of an existing award (and therefore invalid.)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current staffing establishment at Fylde, Blackpool, to deal with family credit claims.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The current staffing complement at North Fylde central office to deal with family credit claims is 779. An additional 33 staff years are available to assist in handling claims in periods of high activity.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the number of (a) filled posts, and (b) unfilled posts, for each of the last 12 months, dealing with family credit at Fylde, Blackpool; and if he will make a statement on staffing requirements to deal with family credit applications by the Fylde office at Blackpool.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information about filled and unfilled posts is not available in the form requested. The allocation of staff years and expenditure against allocation in the last 12 months is in the table:

	Budget (staff years)	Expenditure (staff years)
1989
July	69·50	74·17
August	69·25	72·60
September	67·83	68·84
October	67·58	67·32
November	67·58	67·32
December	67·00	71·80
1990

February	66·50	66·89
March	66·50	66·83
April	64·92	63·56
May	64·92	64·02
June	64·92	65·69

Months where expenditure exceeded budget reflect the injection of additional resources in the light of the work load situation at the time.

The present complement of 779 was set for 1990-91 following a staff inspection to ascertain correct staffing levels against anticipated work load. An additional 33 staff years were allocated for use during periods of high activity.

Resettlement Unit

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has agreed business targets for the resettlement unit's executive agency for the current financial year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Yes. They form part of the Resettlement Agency's business plan, a copy of which will be placed in the Library shortly.

Social Security Acts

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has received the report by the Government Actuary on the operation of the Social Security Acts since 1980.

Mr. Newton: I have today laid before the House the report that the Government Actuary has made on the operation of the Social Security Acts between April 1980 and April 1985 in accordance with section 137 of the Social Security Act 1975. The report provides a detailed forward look into the next century on the possible future costs of benefits paid out on the national insurance fund and on the contributions likely to be needed to pay for them. The Government will take this report into account in the normal processes for reviewing contributions and benefit expenditure.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by how much public expenditure has been reduced as a result of policy changes to housing benefit each year since 1987, both at current prices and at 1990 prices; and what has been the cumulative total of savings.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 21 June 1990]: Direct comparisons over this period are difficult both because the definition of what constitutes public expenditure has changed and because the replacement of domestic rates by the community charge has involved a fundamental change to the structure of the benefit. It is also not feasible to isolate the effects of individual policy changes in such a way as to judge their cumulative effect over time because they cannot readily be disaggregated from other factors affecting benefit expenditure such as benefit upratings, movements in housing costs and income levels, the level of the domestic rates or community charge set by local authorities, and changes in the numbers and compositions of the caseload.

However, in very broad terms, the overall effect of policy changes over this period has been to increase public expenditure on housing benefit and community charge benefit and also to increase the overall spending on housing benefit and on other social security support to assist with payments of rates and community charges. The main changes on a year-on-year basis are as follows. The 1988 reforms were estimated at the time to save £150 million in public expenditure on housing benefit, compared with continuing the old scheme unchanged. In addition, they were estimated to save some £480 million in expenditure not classified at the time as public expenditure, of which £350 million arose from the requirement for all claimants to meet at least 20 per cent. of domestic rates from their own resources. Against this must be set an increase of £400 million in public expenditure from the adjustment to the benefit rates to provide help with this contribution to those receiving income-related benefits.

In the year of the reforms there were certain improvements to the scheme which increased overall expenditure. These were the higher capital limit (£35 million) and the transitional protection scheme for vulnerable groups (£65 million).

Since then there have been further improvements including a package of measures for poorer pensioners (£32 million) and the further increase in the capital limit (£90 million). The transfer of support for the accommodation costs of boarders from income support increased housing benefit expenditure by £190 million. The more generous taper used for community charge benefit in 1990-91 is estimated to cost a further £210 million.

Civil Servants

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many civil servants in his Department of the rank of principal or equivalent and above are graduates of Oxford and Cambridge; and how many are graduates of other universities.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 12 July 1990]: Departmental personnel records show that 346 officers in grades 1 to 7 (and professional equivalents) in the Department of Social Security have degrees: 52 are graduates of Oxford or Cambridge and 294 graduated from other universities.

SCOTLAND

Afforestation

114. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether Her Majesty's Government are considering suggestions by scientists that adequate and extensive afforestation schemes in Britain and Europe could play an important part in the efforts to solve the problems of air pollution and global warming.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Government are fully aware that growing trees absorb significant quantities of carbon dioxide from the atmosphere, thus helping to counter the problem of global warming. We provide substantial grants to encourage afforestation in the United Kingdom, and we supported the forestry action programme initiative launched by the European Community just over a year ago.

River Tweed Fisheries

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what involvement his Department had in the alterations to the cauld in the River Tweed at Melrose and of work being carried out on the river bed in the vicinity of Horncliffe; and whether he has made any assessment of the likely effect of these works, and of steps which may be taken to reinstate the river bed at these points, on salmon and sea trout fisheries.

Mr. Lang: I am not aware of any involvement or request for advice or assessment on the part of the Department in relation to these matters.

For salmon and sea trout fisheries, the River Tweed commissioners have powers under section 57 of the Tweed

Fisheries Act 1857, to compel removal of obstructions to the free run of salmon and sea trout. It would be for the commissioners themselves, in the first instance, to decide whether or not the use of these powers might be appropriate in particular instances.

Accountancy Firms

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to cease using accountancy firms found to be unprofessional by the joint disciplinary scheme.

Mr. Rifkind: On reaching an adverse finding against an accountancy firm, the committee of inquiry appointed under the joint disciplinary scheme may make an order censuring, reprimanding or admonishing such a firm and an order as to costs. My Department would not draw any automatic conclusion from the fact of an adverse finding; careful note would be taken of the terms of the finding in considering whether work should be commissioned from the firm.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to cease using accountancy firms sued by the Government for negligence.

Mr. Rifkind: The existence of current or previous litigation is one of many aspects taken into account in deciding whether accountancy firms should be invited to tender for assignments. The objective must be to ensure that the service required is obtained from the most appropriate source.

Industrial Investment

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the levels of investment in industry in Scotland, the south of Scotland and the Borders for every year since 1979, with 1979 = 100.

Mr. Lang: Industrial investment figures are available only for Scotland as a whole.

The table below gives estimates of gross domestic fixed capital formation for industry in Scotland at current prices for each year since 1979 to 1987, the latest year for which figures are available.

These figures have not been indexed with 1979 = 100 as this is appropriate only when comparing data through time at constant prices. Constant price figures are not available as separate price deflators are not available for Scotland.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current level of residential care provision for people with a mental handicap in Scotland; and what level of such residential care is recommended in the "Scottish Health Authorities' Review of Priorities for the Eighties and Nineties" document.

Mr. Lang: Provisional figures for 31 March 1989, the latest date for which information is available centrally, show that 2,200 places were available for persons with mental handicap in local authority homes and homes registered by them. In addition, 727 persons resident in homes for the elderly were described as mentally handicapped.

Registered homes and those provided by local authorities themselves constitute only one part of the range of housing and other accommodation which may be provided for persons in this category. The SHARPEN report recommends that priority be given to care in the community services for persons with a mental handicap but does not indicate a specific level of residential care for such people.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list any organisations in Scotland from which he has received representations about planning blight in the development of new services for people who have a mental handicap and other priority care groups; and what was the nature of the representations.

Mr. Lang: Representations have been received from three registered housing associations (Ark, Key and Margaret Blackwood) in respect of special needs housing developments which they were seeking to promote. The concern was that the financial viability of these schemes would be affected by the level of payments they could expect to receive from local authorities in respect of care costs for residents following the transfer of financial responsibility and resources from the Department of Social Security.

It was pointed out in reply that it will be for local authorities to decide on the allocation of the resources to be transferred to them from the Department of Social Security for expenditure on care in the community; and that this discretion applies fully to the level of support to be provided for meeting residential care and other costs in individual cases.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of Department of Social Security payment of income support to people with a mental handicap living in residential care in Scotland was considered to be spent inappropriately because the person was not in fact in need of such care.

Mr. Lang: The award of income support does not incorporate a test of care need. A Government-financed study of persons living in private and voluntary residential care homes for the elderly and receiving income support payments was carried out in 1987; one of the four local authority areas studied was in Scotland. No similar study has been carried out in relation to persons with a mental handicap.

Manufacturing Expenditure

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the capital expenditure on manufacturing, including and excluding leasing, in Scotland for the year 1974 and for every year since 1979 at 1985 prices.

Mr. Lang: The information is not available in the form requested.

There are no separate price deflators for Scotland and the use of United Kingdom price deflators is no longer considered to give sufficiently reliable constant price estimates. Figures are therefore given at current prices.

The figures given are for net capital expenditure for manufacturing industries in Scotland. These figures include operating leasing but not financial leasing. It is not possible to give figures for capital expenditure including or excluding leasing.

The table below gives estimates of net capital expenditure in manufacturing industries in Scotland at current prices for the years in question. The figures relate to financial years.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland was first aware of the extent of landings into Peterhead emanating from area VIIa.

Mr. Lang: The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland first became aware of an increase in the level of landings into Scotland of non-sector cod from area VIIa at the beginning of June. At that point, the monthly allocation for individual non-sector vessels was significantly reduced by fisheries departments. Continued high levels of landings during June resulted in the catch restrictions on each vessel being tightened further from 1 July and eventually to the closure of the fishery to the non-sector from 10 July.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which vessels were physically checked for catch details passing from areas 4 to 6 or areas 6 to 4 in each month separately since 1 January.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 24 June 1990]: The table lists by month the 32 vessels called into Scrabster and inspected following receipt of radio reports.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what catches were recorded by Scottish vessels from ICES areas VIId, VIIb and VIIc in June.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) on 24 July.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries in Scotland has instigated a review of (a) log book recordings, (b) area of activity and (c) distinguishing characteristics of fish being landed in respect of concerns over misdeclarations of landings.

Mr. Lang: Log books are examined each time a fishing vessel lands a catch or when it is boarded at sea. The log book entries are checked to ensure that they are consistent with the quantities and species of fish landed or on board the vessel. Confirmation of the areas of fishing activity are sought by comparing the log book entries with surveillance data provided by fishery protection vessels and aircraft.

The ability to determine area of catch from the physical characteristics of the fish varies from species to species. In the case of cod there is at present no ready and reliable means of distinguishing whether the fish came from the North sea or the Irish sea. It is also possible that a catch landed by a fishing vessel could contain fish from both areas.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many vessels have been contained in Scottish ports for misdeclaring catches from sea areas other than area VII.

Mr. Lang: It is not the policy to detain fishing vessels in port in anticipation of charges being brought for breach of fisheries legislation. A vessel would be detained only where it seemed likely that a court might order forfeiture of the vessel or where it was felt that this would help to ensure that the accused would appear in court to answer the charges.

Borders Region

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all grants given by the Scottish Development Agency to businesses and projects in the Borders region.

Mr. Lang: The amount of Scottish Development Agency grants given to individual businesses or projects is a commercial matter between the agency and the companies or individuals concerned and I am therefore unable to provide the hon. Member with this information. However, I can say that in 1989-90, the Scottish Development Agency made four awards of grant totalling £20,000 under the PRIDE scheme in respect of projects in the Borders region.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of people employed by industrial group, and the average income of each industrial group, in the Borders for every year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: The available information is given in the tables below. Information on employment for the Borders is available only for the years for which there was a census of employment. Information on the income-based estimate of gross domestic product is not available by industry group for the Borders. The table shows the income based estimate of total gross domestic product at factor cost in current prices for each year since 1979 for which an estimate is available.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many vacancies remained unfilled at jobcentres and at career offices, not seasonally adjusted and seasonally adjusted, in the Borders region for every year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: There are no comprehensive statistics on unfilled vacancies. Latest estimates suggest that nationally only about one third of all vacancies are notified to jobcentres. A seasonally adjusted vacancy series is not available below Scotland level. Information on the number of unfilled vacancies, not seasonally adjusted, at jobcentres and careers offices in the Borders region in June of each year since 1979 is set out in the table:

Year (June of each year)	Vacancies at jobcentres	Vacancies at careers offices
1979	464	45
1980	336	10
1981	247	5
1982	246	4
1983	345	9
1984	405	10
1985	530	7
1986	454	9
1987	555	18
1988	941	23
1989	519	24
1990	619	29

[1]Vacancies for the years 1983 to 1988 inclusive, include Community Programme vacancies on the day of the count.

[2]Because of possible duplication (i.e. when a vacancy is notified to both services by an employer) and timing differences the second series should not be added together.

Community Care

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has sought from Scottish local authorities as to their degree of preparedness to take on the new community care responsibilities in April 1991; on what date he last sought this information; and what replies he has received on this issue.

Mr. Lang: I met the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on 15 May to discuss the implementation of the Government's community care proposals. At the meeting the representatives of the convention said that local authorities had made considerable efforts to be ready for implementation on 1 April 1991. Subsequently, in a letter of 29 June to the Secretary of State, the convener of the convention's social work committee indicated that authorities' plans for implementation were at an advanced stage in preparation for 1 April 1991. I believe, however, that the phasing we have now proposed will allow more effective implementation of the changes.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the effect of the new community care responsibilities on the personal community charge levels in 1991 in each region of Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This is a matter for individual local authorities to determine, but, in the light of the revised implementation plan for community care which my right hon. and learned Friend announced last week and the aggregate external finance settlement which he announced earlier today, the effect on community charge levels in 1991-92 should be small.

Investment

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the gross value added per person in civilian employment in Scotland for every year since 1979, with 1979 = 100.

Mr. Lang: The information is not available in the form requested.

There are no separate price deflators for Scotland and the use of United Kingdom price deflators is no longer considered to give sufficiently reliable constant price estimates. Figures are therefore given at current prices.

Gross value added figures are available only for manufacturing industries in Scotland and are taken from the annual census of production.

The table below gives estimates of gross value added, employment and gross value added per employee at current prices for the years in question. The figures relate to financial years. It is not appropriate to index these current price figures to 1979 = 100.

Year	Manufacturing industry Scotland
	Gross value added	Employment	Gross value added per employee

Population

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide the most recent available breakdown of the Scottish adult population by household size in (a) total and (b) percentage terms.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 22 February 1990 at col 865-66. Updated information is not yet available.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish the 1988-89 issue of "Scottish Local Government Financial Statistics"; and whether he will include in that document tables showing the reconciliation between the local authority expenditure figures on a local authority accounting basis and local authority expenditure as defined on a public expenditure White Paper basis in Cm 1015 and Cm 1021.

Mr. Rifkind: The 1988-89 issue of "Scottish Local Government Financial Statistics" is expected to be published in early autumn. The format will be similar to previous issues, and it is not intended to include tables reconciling local authority expenditure figures on the two bases.

Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of vocational qualifications awarded in 1974 and for every year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: The full information requested is not available centrally. The relevant information available covers first degrees and advanced level diplomas awarded to students following full-time or sandwich courses at Scottish universities and colleges. The figures are given below.

Year	Number
1981	14,658
1982	15,102

SDA Grants

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total value of Scottish Development Agency grants by year and local authority since 1979.

Mr. Lang: Information on grants prior to 1981-82 is not available in the form requested. From 1981-82 to 1989-90 the information is set out in the table. Figures for 1989-90 are provisional.

NHS Managers

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many senior managers in administration, professional and technical sections of the NHS in Scotland have left the service either through redundancy, resignation or early retirement during the past five years.

Mr. Rifkind: A senior manager structure was introduced into the National Health Service in Scotland on 22 December 1987. Since that date, one officer in that category has retired prematurely from the service on grounds of redundancy and five on grounds of the interests of the efficiency of the service. No information is available centrally on resignation for any other reason.

Prisoners

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many prisoners from Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic are currently serving a prison sentence in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I regret that this information is not available in the format requested. However, on the basis of provisional figures, in 1989, 56 persons born in Northern Ireland and 22 persons born in the Irish Republic were received under sentence into penal establishments in Scotland.

Health Expenditure

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table of expenditure in 1988-89 by Scottish local authorities in respect of persons in residential care homes by the client groups (i) elderly, (ii) physically handicapped, (iii) mentally handicapped and (iv) mentally ill.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is set out in the table.

	[1]Net expenditure on residential care in 1988-89 (£m)
Elderly	65·4
Physically handicapped	1·8
Mentally handicapped	10·0
Mentally ill	0·5

[1] Net expenditure met from rates and grants.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money will be available to local authorities and voluntary organisations for the new mental illness project grant; when the final guidance will be issued to local authorities and other bodies; what provision there will be in Scotland for a special grant for projects helping people with alcohol and drug-related problems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: As my right hon. and learned Friend indicated in his written reply to the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) on 18 July, specific grant will be payable for increased community services for the mentally ill from 1991-92. Grant will be paid at 70 per cent. of the costs of projects up to a total of £3 million in the first year. A consultation paper outlining the proposed arrangements for the payment of grant was issued to local authorities and voluntary agencies in March. Formal guidance reflecting the result of these consultations will be provided to local authorities shortly.

Voluntary sector projects providing assistance to persons with alcohol or drug-related problems will continue to be eligible to receive grant from my Department under section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968. In 1990-91 £96,000 has been made available for current expenditure and £260,000 for capital expenditure. In addition the Scottish Office will continue to make funds available to health boards for the welfare of local drug misuse services. The level of support provided in 1990-91 is £2·2 million.

Marine Nature Reserves

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the sites under consideration for possible designation as marine nature reserves indicating which is the first to be designated and the likely date of designation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Two potential marine nature reserves have been identified in Scotland by NCC using guidelines laid down in the joint NCC/NERC report entitled "Nature Conservation in the Marine Environment". These are Loch Sween in Argyll and St. Abbs in Berwickshire. Work on Loch Sween is more advanced and is about to enter the public consultation stage.

Birch Point (Dumping Allegations)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the preliminary findings of the initial investigation into the alleged dumping of explosives at Birch Point in the Firth of Clyde.

Mr. Lang: A report on the preliminary survey and other investigations carried out by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland is being published today. I am arranging for copies of the report to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

The report confirms that although there were shortcomings in ICI's sea disposal procedures in the early 1980s, these were resolved satisfactorily with the full co-operation of the company. The evidence of the survey indicates that the movement of dumped material from the dump site has been due to fishing activity in and around the disposal ground. It is not possible to say how far dumped material may have been spread.

The further survey of the dump site, which I announced last week, is now in progress. To enable the survey to proceed undisturbed by fishing activity all fishing in the area has been prohibited for the duration of the survey. The results of this survey should provide the basis for decisions on further guidance to fishermen, the control of fishing activity and any steps to be taken in relation to the dump site itself.

Highlands and Islands

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is now able to announce which areas of the highlands and islands are to be targeted under the business development scheme of the rural enterprise programme announced on 17 November 1989.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton I am pleased to announce that the rural enterprise programme's business development scheme, which is designed to help farmers and crofters diversify into new enterprises, will operate initially in Wester Ross, Lochalsh, Lochaber and south-east Sutheriand. Subject to parliamentary approval of the statutory instrument, locally based project officers should be appointed this autumn, and I expect the first awards to be made under the BDS next spring. Subject to the response achieved in these areas, Ministers will review the case for extending the BDS to other areas next autumn.

I have also decided that the REP's marketing scheme, which is designed to help farmers and crofters to market their produce more effectively, to promote a diversified business, and to publicise the benefits of improving the health status of livestock, will operate throughout the Highlands and Islands area eligible for assistance under objective 5b of the EC structural funds. I hope that the marketing scheme will be in operation before the end of 1990.

Parole

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he has given to the Kincraig committee's report on parole and related issues in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: When the Kincraig report (Cm598) was published in March 1989, I invited comments on the review committee's recommendations from all concerned. I am grateful for the very positive response which this elicited.

The Government's conclusions and proposals are published today in a paper entitled "Parole and Related Issues in Scotland—The Government's Response to the Report of the Review Committee", copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Our proposals are based very substantially on the review committee's recommendations and reflect full acceptance of the underlying principles which they identified. Accordingly, our main proposals are that

- all prisoners should serve at least half their sentences in custody;
- release before the end of sentence should always be conditional, thus restoring meaning to the full sentence passed by the court;
- parole should be available to prisoners serving sentences of four years or more, who would be eligible for parole from the half-way point in their sentences, and should be considered in the light of statutory criteria of which the most important should be whether the prisoner can safely be released without risk to the public;
- there should be compulsory post-release supervision for all longer term prisoners, and, at the discretion of the courts, for prisoners sentenced to between one year and under four years.

The aim of these proposals is that reformed arrangements for early release should be fairer than the existing arrangements, under which prisoners convicted of more serious offences may serve a smaller proportion of their sentence in custody than shorter-term prisoners, and that there should be a greater emphasis on the behaviour of offenders after their release from custody.

I shall seek a suitable opportunity to bring before Parliament the legislative changes which will be required to implement these proposals.

Teacher Shortages

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the geographic and subject areas in which there is a current teacher shortage in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 24 July 1990]: Information about the number of vacancies in full-time teaching posts, by education authority and by subject, as on 31 January 1990 is given in the following tables.

The present teacher supply situation in Scotland is broadly satisfactory. The Scottish Education Department will continue to monitor teacher numbers, and, with advice from the planning group on teacher supply, set up in 1989, and on which education authorities, colleges of education and the General Teaching Council for Scotland are represented, will consider and instigate measures required to maintain an adequate intake to the teacher force in Scotland.

Pre-school Education

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children received pre-five education in Scottish state schools during sessions (a) 1988-89 and (b) 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 24 July 1990]: There were 40,855 and 42,269 children in education authority nursery schools or departments in 1988-89 and 1989-90 respectively.

Adult Education

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many adults enrolled in day-time classes in Scottish state schools in the following school sessions (a) 1987-88, (b) 1988-89 and 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 24 July 1990]: There were 12,900, 14,010 and 13,525 persons aged over 18 years old who had resumed education in education authority schools in sessions 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 respectively. This information was published in SED statistical bulletins 1/B1/1988, 5/B1/1989 and 9/B1/1990, copies of which are in the Library.

The presence of adults in the classroom is beneficial both to the pupils and to the adults themselves, and I expect that more adults will choose this path to continue their education in future. It is, however, for education authorities themselves to decide how far they wish and can afford to go in providing school education beyond the statutory requirements.

WALES

Local Offices

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes are currently being proposed to the pattern of local employment offices in Gwynedd; if he will give details of the assessed annual financial savings arising from these changes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Operational issues are a matter for the chief executive of the employment service. I have referred the hon. Gentleman's question to the director for Wales.

Inward Investment

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total amount of inward investment by foreign-owned companies into Wales for each year from 1978-79 to the present.

Mr. David Hunt: The information is as follows:

Year	Number of projects	Capital investment £ million
1979	18	—
1980	16	—
1981	20	—
1982	17	—

1985	48	144
1986	50	155
1988	56	1,048

Information on inward investment projects in Wales by foreign-owned companies is held by Welsh Development International only for the years 1984 onwards. Capital investment associated with projects is that supplied by companies at the time. Final figures for 1989 are not yet available. Project numbers for the years prior to 1984 are those notified to the Invest in Britain Bureau.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how far in advance changes in the ownership or management of private institutions for mentally handicapped people have to be notified.

Mr. Grist: There is no specified period in which changes in the ownership or management of private homes for mentally handicapped people have to be notified in advance.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what checks a social services department, health authority or any other relevant authority is obliged to make in respect of the suitability of (a) the proprietor, (b) the manager and (c) anyone with a position of responsibility in respect of a private establishment for mentally handicapped people.

Mr. Grist: In assessing the fitness of persons concerned or intended to be concerned with a private home for mentally handicapped people, registration staff are expected to consider individuals' qualifications, health skills, proven experience, and, where appropriate, financial acumen. Registration authorities should also ascertain whether applicants for registration have been convicted of any offence under the Registered Homes Act 1984. Furthermore, authorities are advised to inquire into whether applicants have any other criminal convictions, including "spent" convictions within the meaning of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will undertake a review of the arrangements under which the suitability of people involved in the management and/or ownership of private establishments for the mentally handicapped is monitored; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: No. It is the responsibility of the registering authority to monitor the arrangements for assessing the suitability of people involved in the management and/or ownership of private establishments for people with a mental handicap under guidance issued by the Department.

Countryside Council

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was anticipated to be the date upon which the Countryside Council for Wales would commence its activities on 1 January; and if he will make a statement.

(2) when he expects the Countryside Council for Wales to commence its activities; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if there has been any delay in the financing, establishment and starting date of the Countryside Council for Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Subject to the passing of the relevant legislation, the Countryside Council for Wales will take over the responsibilities of the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission in Wales with effect from 1 April 1991 as originally envisaged. The council will, however, be formally established before then, on a date to be determined, to enable it to prepare for its new role. The council will receive grant-in-aid from the date of its formal establishment.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to announce the composition of the Countryside Council for Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has already announced his intention to appoint Mr. Michael Griffith as the first chairman of the Countryside Council for Wales. My right hon. Friend and I are also currently considering the names of a number of candidates for other appointments to the council. An announcement will be made in due course.

Hospital Catering

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken in relation to South Glamorgan health authority, to ensure that all necessary physical conditions and procedures are satisfactorily met in the catering departments at its district general hospitals.

Mr. Grist: The Department issued the latest guidance to district health authorities on food hygiene and pest control in the NHS in 1988. Responsibility for inspecting hospital catering premises and for monitoring food hygiene procedures generally within hospitals rests with the relevant local authority environmental health departments.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what advice his Department has given regarding the use of cook-chill methods (a) generally and (b) in national health service institutions in Wales; and if he will place copies of any guidance in the Library.

Mr. Grist: General advice on the subject was contained in the press release "Advice to the Public on Listeria and Food" issued by the Chief Medical Officer at the Department of Health on 10 February 1989. This advice was drawn to the attention of all chief environmental health officers and medical officers of environmental health.

Further advice was provided in a letter entitled "Listeriosis and Food", copies of which were sent to all doctors in Wales on 21 February 1989.

The most recent guidelines on cook-chill and cook-freeze catering systems were issued to the NHS in Wales on 5 July 1989.

Copies of all these documents have been placed in the Library of the House.

Pollution Inspectors

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales who is the officer of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution with responsibilities for Wales; what are his other duties; how much time he has spent in Wales in the current year; and when he last met him.

Mr. Grist: The head of west division of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution (HMIP), based in Bristol, has overall responsibility for Wales. I have not yet had an opportunity to meet him, though our officials do so on a regular basis. There are also seven pollution inspectors with responsibility for Wales based in Cardiff.

Pollution, Port Talbot

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration he has given to pollution from British Petroleum Chemicals at Port Talbot in the last two months; and what steps he intends to take to remedy the situation.

Mr. Grist: I refer the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the reply given to him on 20 July at columns 758-59.

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will ask Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution to monitor on a day-to-day basis industrial pollution at Port Talbot for the next three months.

Mr. Grist: Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution assures me that it will continue to discharge its statutory responsibilities in conjunction with the local authority as necessary.

Severn Crossing

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to establish a liaison committee consisting of representatives of local community councils, Monmouth borough council, Gwent county council, the contractors and a representative of the Welsh Office to safeguard the environmental interests of people living near the construction of the second Severn crossing.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The most effective way of establishing liaison between the contractors and local communities on the environmental and other issues involved in this major project is currently under consideration.

Emergency Provision

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy that, following the implementation of the relevant sections of the National Health Service and Community Care Act, allowance will be made for sums to be paid by the health authorities of patients who receive emergency or other treatment while on holiday in another district health authority area to be held over for expenditure in the succeeding financial year.

Mr. Grist: Patients will of course be entitled to emergency treatment while on holiday, and it is the responsibility of each health authority to provide adequate accident and emergency cover in its area. When a patient is admitted to hospital for emergency treatment, the authority in which he or she lives will be responsible for meeting the costs of the treatment required. There will be no question of patients being unable to get treatment they urgently need because of uncertainty over payment. Health authorities will need to set aside funds for such eventualities, and we expect settlements to be made promptly—normally within the financial year—to protect the financial position of the hospitals providing treatment.

BISF Houses

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet a delegation of hon. Members, peers and residents to discuss steel-framed houses and the Parnham report on BISF houses; an assessment of condition.

Mr. Grist: I understand the Parnham report is specific to the Nottingham area. In those circumstances, a meeting would not seem appropriate.

Year of the Disabled

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he intends to take to promote 1991 as the Year of the Disabled in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State delivered a speech, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, at a Wales Council for the Disabled event on Friday 20 July 1990, in which he stressed the importance of 1991 as the Year of the Disabled in Wales: a year in which substantial progress is made for people with disabilities and their carers to have ready access to the facilities and opportunities which able-bodied people take for granted. I fully support this objective.

To this end, on 8 May 1990 my Department issued to all health and local authorities and other interests in Wales guidance on good practice in the provision of services for people with physical or sensory disabilities. We will shortly publish details of the targeted grants which will be available in Wales from April 1991 to help provide more flexible forms of domiciliary care.

Help is also available through the new renovation grants regime for disabled people to receive financial support—up to 100 per cent. where appropriate—to help them to live independently in their own homes. For those who need to rent, nearly all the homes provided through Housing for Wales are built to mobility standards and a significant proportion of the annual programme goes to meet specific special needs provision.

We will take every opportunity to reiterate the key messages to all with a part to play, including public bodies, the private sector and the community at large and ensure that they are taken forward as part of the comprehensive programme for the improvement of social and community care as set out in White Paper "Caring for People" and in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) on 18 July.

HEALTH

Medway Health District

Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the figures for the number of hospital in-patients treated in the Medway health district in 1988-89, or the most recent year for which figures are available and in the previous year.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is shown in the table.

Year	In-patient cases treated
1986	37,300
1987-88	38,400
1988-89	36,200

Figures for all three years are deaths and discharges. Figures for 1987-88 have been adjusted to be comparable with definitions used in 1986 and 1988-89.

Junior Doctors

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in negotiations on proposals for a reduction in the hours worked by junior doctors.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I recently met with representatives of all key parties, including the profession, to discuss this matter.

The talks were both productive and encouraging. A working group has been established to explore the main issues. It has been asked to make an initial report later this summer when I shall next meet them formally to discuss its findings.

In-patients, Barnet

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the latest number of in-patient cases treated by Barnet health authority.

Mr. Dorrell: During 1988-89, the latest year for which data are available, a total of 36,482 in-patient cases were treated by Barnet district health authority. That is 9 per cent. more than in 1979.

NHS (Environmental Proposals)

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action is being taken to make the national health service more environmentally friendly.

Mr. Dorrell: We recently launched two campaigns—"Brighter and Better Hospitals", concerned with generally improving hospitals' internal and external environments, and "Towards a Greener NHS", concerned with energy conservation, the use of lead-free petrol in NHS vehicles and reducing air pollution from waste incinerators.

Health authorities are also encouraged, and are taking active steps, to reduce their use of CFCs and to examine possibilities both of collecting waste for recycling and the use of recycled materials.

Details of the campaigns are given in Health Service Estate journal No. 70 (June 1990), copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Community Care

Mr. Allen Mckay: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding funding arrangements for the Government's community care proposals.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding funding arrangements for the Government's community care proposals.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Many representations on all aspects of community care, including funding, have been received, from a wide variety of organisations. The local authority associations were invited to submit their views on the costs to the Department. These views have informed the Government's decision on the phasing of community care and the local authority settlement announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 19 July at columns 1185-1208.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is his estimate of the coist to local authorikties of preparing for the community care reforms to have been implemented in April 1991, now that he has postponed them;

(2) iff any compensation will be available to local authorities for the preparatory expenditure for the community care reforms which have now been postponed; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. We made adequate allowance in the local authority settlement for 1990-91 for pre-implementation costs for our proposals which build on existing good practice.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the waiting list initiative.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) on 18 January at columns 403-4. The inter-authority comparisons and consultancy (IACC) initiative mentioned in my earlier reply is now complete and has been very effective in reducing waiting times. The number of patients waiting over a year in the 43 specialties studied by the IACC team has virtually been halved, and has reduced by 37 per cent. in the 22 districts as a whole. IACC published its full report on 19 July this year, and copies are available in the Library.

Manchester Hospitals (Staffing)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about staffing levels in hospitals in Greater Manchester.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 3 July at columns 545-46.

Ex-psychiatric Patients

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many ex-psychiatric patients he estimates now to be living in the community; what were the comparable figures five years and 15 years ago; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally.

In-patients

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average number of in-patients treated in a week in 1979 and in 1989.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table.

In-patient cases treated, NHS hospitals, England, 1979 and 1988-89

Year	In-patient cases treated[1]	In-patient cases treated per week
1979	5,400,120	103,848
1988-89	6,585,982	126,654
Increase	1,185,862	22,805
Percentage increase	22	22

Hospitals, Kendal

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the number of hospital beds currently available in the Kendal district; and what is the anticipated number which will be available when the new hospital is open;

(2) what is the number of doctors, nurses and other support staff who currently work in hospitals in the Kendal area; and what are the anticipated numbers who will be employed when the new hospital is open.

Mr. Dorrell: Information on the number of hospital beds and the number of hospital staff employed is collected by district only. The current available information on South Cumbria district is as follows:

	[3]Number
Average daily available beds (1988-89)	796
Medical and dental staff including locums (1988)[1]	90
Nursing and midwifery including agency staff (1988)	1,120
Support staff (1988)[2]	810

[1] Includes permanent paid, honorary and locum staff. Excludes senior registrars and consultants in non-teaching DHAs and senior registrars in teaching DHAs—these staff have their contracts with the RHA.

[2] Includes administration and clerical, ancilliary, professional and technical, works, maintenance and ambulance staff.

[3] "Number of staff employed are expressed as Whole Time Equivalents (WTE) and rounded up to the nearest 10."

My right hon. Friend may wish to contact the chairman of South Cumbria health authority for further information.

Donated Equipment

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the value of equipment donated to the national health service by charity organisations and public appeals for each year since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Social Workers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps have been taken to improve the training of approved social workers resulting from the publication in February of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work paper on refresher training for approved social workers.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: As CCETSW's paper says, responsibilities for continuing the work now firmly lies with local authorities and professional associations. CCETSW will continue to monitor the quality and content of training for approved social workers and to encourage their professional development. CCETSW will also continue to disseminate guidance and to provide training opportunities for training officers and supervisors of approved social workers.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans are being made to equip social workers and other local authority staff with the knowledge and skills to make assessments of the need for social care of mentally ill people receiving hospital treatment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The training of approved social workers helps to equip them in making assessments of the needs of mentally ill people. Preparation for making assessments is also being incorporated in both qualifying and post-qualifying training for social workers and in the training of other social care staff.

Mental Health Act

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects that mental health statistics will be available for the number of hospital beds, the number of patients, their admission and discharge, length of stay and detention under various sections of the Mental Health Act 1983 for a later year than 1986.

Mr. Dorrell: We expect to issue a statistical bulletin covering the period to 1990 by early next year.

Free Prescriptions

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he now proposes to make any extension to the categories covered by free prescriptions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. A full charge is paid on less than one in five prescription items dispensed in the NHS. The present exemption arrangements protect those who are likely to have difficulty in paying charges. Those who are not exempt but who need a lot of prescriptions can limit their outlay by buying a prepayment certificate.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to announce the results of his consideration of applicants for self-governing status so far received for the south-western region.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Each NHS trust application will be the subject of a three- month public consultation. I shall announce my decision on each application after I have had an opportunity to consider the outcome of the public consultation. I expect therefore to announce my decision on the first NHS trusts in November 1990.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if staff employed by a potential national health service trust will be included in the three-month public consultation exercise which will follow each application to become a national health service trust.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have consistently made it clear that we expect staff of potential trusts to be among those consulted by the regional health authority on an application for trust status.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will extend the consultation period in relation to the submission of views to him concerning hospitals in Bradford becoming a self-governing trust; if he will list the individuals and organisations to whom the application prospectus has been sent; what is the total cost of the production, printing and distribution of the prospectus; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We believe that three months should be ample time for public consultation on NHS trust applications. Regional health authorities are responsible for managing such consultations. The hon. Member may wish to contact Yorkshire RHA for information on the management of the consultation in Bradford.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, following his announcement of the provisional chairman and deputy chairman of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority, he will now announce the remaining membership.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am pleased to announce that the following people have indicated their willingness to serve as members of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority:

Margaret Auld FRCN, formerly Chief Nursing Officer, Scottish Home and Health Department; Vice President, Royal College of Midwives;

Professor Robert J. Berry FRSE, Professor of Genetics at the University of London;

Professor Ian Cooke FRCOG, Professor of Obstetrics and Gynaecology, University of Sheffield Jessop Hospital for Women; specialist in reproductive medicine.

Professor Antony Cox FRCP FRCPsych, University of London Professor of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry at the United Medical and Dental Schools of Guy's and St. Thomas's Hospitals.

Liz Forgan, Director of Programmes at Channel 4 Television;

Joan Harbison ABPsS, Senior Lecturer in Education, Stranmillis College, Belfast;

Dr. Stephen Hillier PhD MRCPath, Director of Reproductive Endocrinology Laboratory, Department of Obstetrics and Gynaecology, University of Edinburgh Centre for Reproductive Biology;

Professor Brenda Hoggett QC, Law Commissioner; Recorder of the Crown Court; Visiting Professor of Law at King's College, London;

The Rt. Rev. Richard Holloway, Bishop of Edinburgh;

Dr. Helen Houston, MD MRCGP, general practitioner, Senior Lecturer in Continuing Medical Education at the Department of Postgraduate Studies, University of Wales College of Medicine.

Penelope Keith, actress;

Angela Mays, training consultant;

Dr. Anne McLaren FRS, Director of the Medical Research Council Mammalian Development Unit;

Rabbi Julia Neuberger, Visiting Fellow, King's Fund Institute; Chairman of the Patients' Association;

Professor Robert W. Shaw FRCS (Ed) MRCOG, Professor of Obstetrics and Gynaecology at the Royal Free Hospital School of Medicine;

David Shilson, senior official in the Bank of England;

Professor Robert Snowden, Professor of Family Studies at Exeter University;

Christine Walby, Director of Social Services, Solihull;

Professor David Whittingham FRCVS, Professor of Experimental Embryology, University of London and Director of the Medical Research Council Experimental Embryology and Teratology Unit.

As the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority cannot be set up by the United Kingdom Health Ministers until the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Bill has received Royal Assent, their acceptance is on a provisional basis until then.

The members have been selected on the basis of their experience and personal qualities and not as representatives of any group or profession. They have been chosen so as to ensure that the authority is informed by views and experience across a wide range of relevant disciplines.

Miss Auld, Professor Cooke, Dr. Hillier, Dr. McLaren, Rabbi Neuberger, and Professor Shaw are currently members of the Interim Licensing Authority. This body was set up in 1985 by the Medical Research Council and the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists pending legislation on human fertilisation and embryology. It will continue in being until the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority assumes its full powers, probably in the summer of 1991.

Road Accident Victims

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimates he has for the total medical and ambulance costs associated with treatment for victims of road accidents; how much is recouped from insurance companies to meet the cost of treating road accident victims; and what plans he has to put in hand arrangements to recover any shortfall.

Mr. Dorrell: Information on the actual cost to the National Health Service in England of road accidents is not collected by the Department. However, the Department of Transport has estimated the medical and ambulance costs associated with the treatment of road accident victims in Great Britain at around £160 million in 1988.

Under the Road Traffic Act 1988 health authorities may levy an emergency treatment fee on the user of the vehicle involved in the accident. They may also raise charges for inpatient and outpatient treatment of road accident victims, subject to statutory maxima, against the owner of the vehicle or the authorised insurer. The total income collected by health authorities in England was £8·7 million in 1988-89. Details of the element recouped from insurance companies is not available.

Radioactive Caesium

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond), Official Report, 9 July, column 67, if he will publish such information as he possesses for the past five years on the number of reported cases of radioactive caesium in people.

Mr. Dorrell: In the United Kindom the presence of radiocaesium in people is widespread but can be detected only by sophisticated monitoring equipment. The Department of the Environment are sponsoring a survey using mobile equipment of levels of radiocaesium in people in parts of England and Wales. Preliminary results demonstrate that in every person monitored the radiocaesium activity was less than one fifth of the radioactive potassium activity naturally present in the body. This represents a negligible risk to health.

Blood

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any plans to introduce legislation to enable United Kingdom health authorities to sell whole blood and red cell concentrates to health authorities in 1992 in the single European market.

Mr. Dorrell: No.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to enable the United Kingdom blood transfusion service to develop a programme which, subject to acceptable and validated product quality, would ensure that all plasma-derived factor VIII concentrate used in the national health services will be derived from United Kingdom blood donors.

Mr. Dorrell: At present approximately 70 per cent. of the factor VIII used in England and Wales is produced at the Bio Products Laboratory from the plasma of unpaid donors to the national blood transfusion service. The remainder is commercially produced factor VIII which is imported into the United Kingdom. The imported products are prescribed as a result of the preference of individual clinicians. The Bio Products Laboratory is, therefore, meeting in full the demand for its factor VIII, as it is for virtually all other blood products. It is making efforts to increase its share of the blood products market in this country, but the choice of product remains with the clinicians.

Information relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Advertising

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department has spent on advertising and other promotional material for campaigns regarding (a) nurse recruitment, (b) blood donor recruitment, (c) drug misuse and (d) the national health service reforms, in 1988-89, 1989-90 and the estimated budgets in 1990-91.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Expenditure and estimated budget figures for the years 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91 for campaigns relating to nurse recruitment, blood donor recruitment, drug misuse and the national health service reforms are as follows:

£ million

	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91 (estimate)
Nurse recruitment	2·338	4·184	3·871
Blood donor recruitment	0·405	0·641	0·627
Drug misuse	2·668	3·808	4·542
National health service reforms	0·139	0·359	2·746

RU486

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has received a report of the results of the British multi-centre trials of the drug RU486; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: For reasons of commercial confidentiality the licensing authority does not disclose information about the receipt or progress of applications for permission to conduct clinical trials in patients, or of product licence applications. The result of all clinical trials are required to be submitted when an application for a product licence is made.

Salmonella

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the recent salmonella outbreak at Burnley general hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: There was an outbreak of food poisoning at Burnley general hospital in June this year due to Salmonella enteritidis PT4. The likely cause was cross-contamination from chicken which was defrosted in metal trays normally used for salads.

Implementation of guidance issued by the Department of Health enables health authorities to maintain standards of hygiene and safety of patient meals. In particular, the guidance warns of the need to take care to ensure that raw meat, including poultry, does not come into contact with cooked or prepared foods.

Publicity

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total expenditure on advertising, publicity and communications (a) in 1989-90 and (b) in 1979-80, excluding any expenditure relating to social security which came under his Department's jurisdiction at that time.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The total expenditure on advertising, publicity and communications for the years 1989-90 and 1979-80 are as follows:

1979-80 £ million	1989-90 £ million
1·526	17·244

Emergency Provision

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy that, following the implementation of the relevant sections of the National Health Service and Community Care Act, allowance will be made for sums to be paid by the health authorities of patients who receive emergency or other treatment while on holiday in another district health authority area to be held over for expenditure in the succeeding financial year.

Mr. Dorrell: If a person requires hospital treatment while away from home, the cost will be borne by the local district health authority in the case of outpatient attendance at a casualty department, and by the patient's home district health authority in the case of inpatient treatment. Districts will normally remit treatment costs to NHS providers within one month. It is already possible for health authorities to hold over up to half a per cent. of their budgets from one year to the next.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many notifications of abortion were received by the chief medical officer later than seven days after the abortion took place during 1988.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 24 May 1990]: The answer is 54 per cent. The explanations given

Heart Disease

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest statistics of (a) deaths and (b) sufferers from heart disease in each health district in the north-west region.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 23 July 1990]: Information about the number of deaths due to heart disease is given in the table.

Asthma

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has in respect of the numbers of people affected by asthma in (a) 1990, (b) 1985 and (c) 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 24 July 1990]: Precise figures on people affected by asthma are not collected centrally. However, it is estimated that there are approximately 1 million diagnosed asthmatics in England and Wales at present.

ENVIRONMENT

Pollution Control

8. Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the director of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution to discuss progress in pollution control.

Mr. Trippier: I meet the director of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution regularly and discuss progress on all aspects of HMIP's business including the discharge of the inspectorate's regulatory functions.

Tenants' Choice

11. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the transfer of housing under the tenants' choice provision of the Housing Act 1988.

Mr. Nicholls: Tenants' choice continues to help improve the quality of management on local authority estates, by offering tenants a viable alternative which in turn has encouraged local authorities to look much harder at the service they provide.

Public Water Supplies

14. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in reducing the nitrate levels of public water supplies.

Mr. Trippier: Considerable progress has been achieved in recent years in reducing nitrate levels in public water supplies. In addition to finding new nitrate-free sources, water companies have been blending water of high nitrate concentration with water of low nitrate concentration to meet the standard and have been developing de-nitrification treatment processes. Water companies have made undertakings to meet the required standards by these several means progressively over the coming years. All supplies will comply by 1995 at the latest. Those supplies which do not meet the standard in the interim are not considered to endanger health.

Water Quality

20. Mr. Gow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent communications he has received from the Commission in Brussels about the quality of the United Kingdom's drinking water and beaches.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The European Commission has commenced court proceedings against this country and virtually all other member states on the bathing water and drinking water directive. I had useful discussions yesterday with the Commission about our very substantial investment programme to improve the quality of our drinking water and bathing waters.

National Parks

21. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the boundaries of the national parks.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No; it is for the Countryside Commission to initiate reviews of the boundaries of national parks.

Athletics

22. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to meet the chairman of the Sports Council to discuss the Government's support for British athletics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: I am meeting the vice-chairman of the Sports Council tomorrow to talk about the council's corporate plan. We will be touching on a variety of issues which may include British athletics.

Bristol Channel (Dumping)

23. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals there are to end the dumping of sewage and sewage sludge in the Bristol channel.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government are committed to ending dumping of sewage sludge at sea by 1998 and to the introduction of treatment for all substantial discharges of sewage. Discussions are now being held with the water industry and relevant regulatory bodies about the implementation of these policies.

Toxic Land

24. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of toxic land from the land register.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is considering various possibilities to accelerate the removal of contaminated land from the land register. Any firm proposals would be the subject of consultation.

Marine Environment

25. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline his Department's responsibilities in respect of protection of the marine environment.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My Department is responsible for the overall co-ordination of Government policies as they affect the environment, including the marine environment.

Local Government Finance

26. Mr. Donald Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many adults in England (a) are eligible to pay the community charge and (b) were registered to pay domestic rates in their last year of existence.

Mr. Nicholls: Some 36 million adults are eligible to pay the community charge this year compared with around 18 million domestic ratepayers under the previous system.

43. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next expects to meet the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of County Councils to discuss the implications for poll tax projections of central Government funding for local services in 1991-92.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend is planning to meet representatives of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of County Councils and other local authority associations at the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance on 17 September. At the meeting he expects to discuss the level and distribution of central Government support for local authority spending in 1991-92.

40. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many charge payers he estimates will have their community charge bill reduced in 1990-91 as a result of the community charge capping of a number of designated local authorities.

Mr. Nicholls: More than 4 million.

37. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to improve further the assessment of the spending needs of local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to changes in standard spending assessments for 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend will announce his proposals for standard spending assessments in the autumn.

35. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received any representations in favour of replacing the community charge with a property tax based on notional rental values.

46. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received any recent representations in favour of replacing the community charge with a property tax based on capital values.

56. Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in favour of replacing the community charge with the old system of domestic rates.

64. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received in favour of a return to the domestic rates.

96. Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in favour of replacing the community charge with a tax on property.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in favour of a return to domestic rates.

Mr. Nicholls: I continue to receive representations on all aspects of local government finance. Not surprisingly, very few of these favour a return to domestic rates.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people, and what proportion, of those required to pay 20 per cent. of their poll tax were liable to pay rates.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 23 July 1990]: I estimate that the community charge bill for about 4 million adults is 20 per cent. or less of the personal charge for their area, and for 2·4 million of this 4 million (58 per cent.) either they or their spouses were former ratepayers.

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentages of local authority expenditure in the current year are financed from the community charge, the unified business rate and central Government support (a) on average in England and (b) in Worthing.

Mr. Portillo: The information is as follows.

Percentage of Local Authority Expenditure Financed by:

	England per cent.	Worthing per cent.
Community charge[1]	27·0	36·4
Unified business rate	26·0	40·1
Central government support[2]	45·3	22·9
Use of reserves	1·7	0·6

[1] Community charges net of community charge benefit and transitional relief grant as reported on authorities' budget returns. These grants are included in Central Government support.

[2] Comprising Revenue Support Grant, safety net adjustments, special grants and specific and supplementary grants both inside and outside Aggregate External Finance.

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated cost to the Exchequer of abolishing the requirement to pay poll tax of those who are currently required to pay only 20 per cent. of the poll tax.

Mr. Nicholls: Based on local authority returns, I estimate that 500,000 students currently receive relief under section 13 of the Local Government Finance Act 1988. It is estimated that these students will pay about £40 million in community charge this year.

The cost of increasing the maximum reduction available through community charge benefit to 100 per cent. is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to collect and to report to the House the average costs of collection of the community charge in its first year in England and Wales (a) per community charge payer and (b) as a proportion of the charge collected.

Mr. Nicholls: Yes.

113. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about his proposals to charge-cap local authorities.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend received a number of representations about his proposals on caps for those local authorities designated for charge capping in 1990-91.

91. Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his best estimates of the losses on poll tax collection likely to be incurred in 1990-91.

Mr. Nicholls: The Government have made no separate estimates or assumptions about losses in the collection of the community charge. There is no reason why the percentage volume of community charge arrears should be any greater than under the rating system.

93. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Government intend to retain the power to cap local authority budgets.

Mr. Nicholls: Yes.

77. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his best estimates of the likely average level of poll tax in 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

101. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made any assessment of spending needs of local authorities for the coming financial year 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Members to the statement which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made to the House on 19 July.

80. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the Association of District Councils; and whether community charge levels were discussed.

75. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the Association of County Councils; and whether levels of local authority spending were discussed.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend met representatives of the Association of District Councils, the Association of County Councils and other local authority associations at the meeting of the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance on 5 July. The meeting discussed the level of spending planned by local authorities in 1990-91, the need for spending by local authorities in 1991-92, and the implications for community charge levels.

70. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received concerning his Department's review of the poll tax.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations.

60. Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will bring forward proposals to replace the community charge.

98. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to review the operation of the community charge with a view to restricting payment to only one person in every household.

103. Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline the principles which guided him in conducting his review of the community charge.

Mr. Nicholls: I have nothing to add to the statement made by my right hon. Friend on 19 July.

52. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to meet local authority leaders to discuss alternatives to the community charge.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope), to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Dykes) on Friday 20 July, Official Report, Volume 176, column 738.

47. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many students in further education under 20 years of age have applied for exemption from the community charge.

Mr. Nicholls: Information about applications for exemptions is not available centrally. I shall publish estimates of numbers of exempt persons when data are available from local authority returns.

Ocean Dumping

28. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met his counterparts in the European Community regarding ocean dumping.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Dumping at sea was discussed by Ministers of North sea states at the third North sea conference held in The Hague in March this year which Ireland, Portugal and Spain also attended as observers.

Environment White Paper

29. Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish his next White Paper on the environment.

Mr. Trippier: This autumn.

Liverpool Football Club

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make representations to UEFA to lift the ban on the entrance of Liverpool football club into European competitions; how many representations he has received against the ban; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: As I made clear in my recent letter and report to UEFA on progress on measures to combat football hooliganism, I believe that a blanket ban on English clubs participating in European competitions is no longer justified. As to the question of lifting UEFA's additional three-year ban on Liverpool football club, in the first instance it is for the English FA to nominate Liverpool and for UEFA to take the final decision. Since August 1989 I have received five letters in support of the lifting of the ban on Liverpool.

Uniform Business Rate

32. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the uniform business rate for the year 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

61. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the increase in the uniform business rate for the year 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend will calculate and notify charging authorities of the national non-domestic rating multiplier for 1991-92 in the autumn. As the hon. Gentlemen will know, however, the multiplier cannot in future rise from year to year in real terms. This compares favourably with the 62 per cent. increase in real terms between 1979-80 and 1989-90 in the non-domestic poundage set by Bradford metropolitan borough council.

Land Register

33. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of underutilised land from the land register.

44. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of dormant land from the land register.

54. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of unused land from the land register.

55. Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of underutilised land from the land register.

63. Mr. Bevan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of underutilised land from the land register.

66. Dr. Blackburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of toxic land from the land register.

71. Mr. Irvine: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he proposes to take to accelerate the removal of derelict land from the land register.

79. Mr. Marland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of derelict land from the land register.

84. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of unused land from the land register.

87. Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of vacant land in the inner cities from the land register.

92. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of dormant land from the land register.

100. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of dormant land from the land register.

107. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of toxic land from the land register.

111. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of vacant land from the land register.

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of dormant land from the land register.

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of derelict land from the land register.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of under-utilised land from the land register.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is considering to accelerate the removal of vacant land from the land register.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friends to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby).

Sewers (Radioactive Discharges)

34. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on radioactive discharges to the public sewer.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), to the hon. Member on 27 June 1990, Official Report, Vol. 175, column 266.

Bathing Waters

36. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the European Commission on the quality of designated bathing waters.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We maintain a dialogue with the Commission on this topic.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will transpose the requirements of designation and compliance of 76/160/EEC bathing water directive to United Kingdom law.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We are at present discussing with the water industry a draft of regulations to be made under the Water Act 1989 to bring the requirements of directive 76/160/EEC explicitly within the scope of United Kingdom law.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to announce a sampling and analysis system to be used by the National Rivers Authority for its monitoring responsibilities in bathing water.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Secretary of State has appointed the National Rivers Authority as the competent authority for implementing directive 76/160/EEC. It is for the National Rivers Authority to determine the appropriate sampling and analysis procedures consistent with the directive.

73. Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of United Kingdom bathing waters complies with the European Community directive; and what the figure was in 1979.

83. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many United Kingdom bathing waters complied with the European Community bathing waters directive (a) in 1979 and (b) at the current time; and what percentage of total designated waters this represents.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In 1979, 18 of the 27 identified bathing waters complied with the directive's mandatory coliform standards; this is 67 per cent. For 1989, 336 of the 440 identified bathing waters complied with the directive's mandatory coliform standards; this is 76 per cent.

Planning Legislation

38. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about existing planning legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: My Department is always receiving comments on the operation of town and country planning legislation and suggestions for improving it. In addition, we have received many comments in response to consultation papers on specific aspects of planning law.

72. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to introduce new planning legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Following recent public consultation exercises my right hon. Friend intends to introduce legislation on town and country planning when the parliamentary timetable permits.

Housing Corporation

39. Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make further funds available to the Housing Corporation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We are already increasing very significantly the level of resources available to the Housing Corporation for investment in housing associations. The corporation's gross capital expenditure in 1989-90 was £935 million; provision for 1990-91 is £1,100 million and is planned to rise to £1,536 million in 1991-92 and £1,736 million in 1992-93.

67. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to meet the chairman of the Housing Corporation to discuss its finances.

Mr. Nicholls: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning meets the chairman of the Housing Corporation from time to time to discuss the corporation's finances and other matters.

Transitional Relief

41. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his best estimates of the level of take-up of transitional relief for non-ratepaying pensioners and people with disabilities for 1990-91.

Mr. Nicholls: I estimate that about half a million elderly or disabled persons in England are entitled to extra help under the transitional relief scheme. They have until 1 October, or later if the charging authority allows, to apply. I therefore have no estimate of the number likely to receive extra relief.

Water Infrastructure Charge

42. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next expects to meet the Director General of Water Services to discuss the workings of the water infrastructure charge.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend will be meeting the Director General of Water Services shortly. They will be discussing a number of matters of general interest.

Housing Associations

45. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of housing association houses and flats is subject to equity sharing agreements; and what proportion carries the right to buy.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Since April 1979 there have been some 22,000 housing association sales in England under shared ownership arrangements. Information about those which have subsequently been fully purchased by the occupier, or reverted to housing association ownership, is not available centrally.

Housing associations owned an estimated 565,000 dwellings in England at the end of March 1990, and the right to buy is available to all tenants except (a) those with assured tenancies, (b) tenants of charitable housing associations, (c) those in housing associations which have not been publicly funded, and (d) those in associations which are fully mutual co-operatives. Estimates of the number of tenants excluded are not available.

Recreational Facilities

48. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what additional playing fields and games facilities, including leisure centres, are estimated to have been established since 1979; what were the figures for the previous five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: It is estimated that during the period from 1980 to 1989 inclusive, 682 new sports facilities were built in England. This figure compares with the 478 that were estimated to have been built during the period 1975-79. No central record of playing fields provision exists.

Sewage Outlets

49. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the sewage outlets into seas and estuaries which were at a planning stage and will now incorporate full treatment, as a result of his North sea conference announcement; how much will be contributed from Government funds; and what proportion of the additional costs that contribution represents.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Discussions are being held with the sewage undertakers, the National Rivers Authority and the Office of Water Services about the implications for individual schemes of the decision to treat all substantial sewage discharges.

The additional costs must be met by the water service companies, although these costs will be eligible for consideration for cost pass-through.

Council Tenants

50. Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures his Department has introduced since 1979 to help council tenants to buy their own homes.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The right to buy was introduced in 1980 to enable council tenants to buy their homes, and has been regularly improved since: the qualifying period has been reduced from three years to two, discounts have been increased and tenants of disabled persons' housing, outside sheltered schemes, have been given the right to buy. Over 1·2 million tenants of local authorities, new towns and housing associations in England have bought their homes as sitting tenants since 1979 under the right to buy or on voluntary terms. Since 1989, local authorities have also had the power to pay grants to help their tenants buy homes of their own on the open market.

65. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest figure he has for the number of tenants in the north-west of England who have bought their homes under the Government's right-to-buy legislation.

Mr. Michael Spicer: It is estimated that, up to the end of March 1990, 111,000 dwellings had been sold by local authorities and new towns in the north-west of England under the right-to-buy legislation.

I have today placed in the Library a table giving available information on local authority sales up to March 1990. It shows year-by-year information for each authority since 1984-85 together with cumulative figures since April 1979 and the proportion of stock sold since April 1979.

Sewage Disposal, Fylde

51. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has received from Lancashire county council for a workable solution to the problems of sewage disposal on the Fylde coast and in the River Ribble.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: North West Water plc is consulting interested parties, including local authorities, about proposals for disposing of sewage on the Flyde coast. It will then be for the National Rivers Authority to consider applications for discharge consents.

European Football Competitions

53. Mr. Barry Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had concerning the re-entry into European football competitions of English football clubs.

Mr. Robert Atkins: I had meetings with both the president and vice-president of UEFA in May. I have also had discussions with the chairman of the Football Association and the chairmen of Manchester United and Aston Villa. On 10 June, I submitted a report to UEFA covering the behaviour of spectators during the 1989-90 domestic season and the World Cup finals in Italy.

I indicated to the president of UEFA that the Government had withdrawn their objections to the participation by English clubs in European competitions.

Taking into account our views, UEFA decided to admit Manchester United to the European cup winners cup and Aston Villa to the UEFA cup next season.

Drinking Water

57. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made a recent assessment of the safety of drinking water.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The quality of drinking water from public supplies in England and Wales is generally of a high quality. Most supplies already comply with the requirements of the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 which incorporate the standards of the EC drinking water directive. Programmes are under way to improve as quickly as practicable those supplies which do not yet comply.

The drinking water inspectorate has commenced inspection of the water companies and will report to my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Wales in 1991 upon the quality of drinking water supplied during the current calendar year.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the levels at which lead in drinking water is officially regarded as safe.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Any exposure to lead should be considered potentially harmful. The Commitee on the Medical Aspects of the Contamination of Air, Soil and Water, an independent committee which advises the chief medical officer, reviewed the position in November 1988. Its conclusions are reproduced in annex 1 of "Guidance on Safeguarding the Quality of Public Water Supplies", which is in the Library. In accordance with the committee's recommendation a standard of 50 micrograms/litre is incorporated in the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989, and applies to any sample rather than to the average level. This is more rigorous than the standard in the EC drinking water directive.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking to reduce the danger of lead in drinking water.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Much has already been done to reduce lead levels in those parts of the country where there was a particular problem.

As well as setting a standard of 50 micrograms/litre for lead in any sample of drinking water, the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 require water companies to carry out additional treatment of drinking water in certain circumstances where, in the company's opinion, this will eliminate, or reduce to a minimum, the risk that the lead level in the water will rise to more than 50 micrograms/litre after leaving the company's pipes; and, where there is such a risk, to co-operate with the owner of the premises in removing its part of any lead pipe which connects directly to a tap using drinking water. Water companies have given undertakings to the Secretary of State to identify by specified dates supply zones where additional treatment may be appropriate, and to install such treatment by specified dates.

The water byelaws prohibit the installation of any pipe or other water fitting made of lead and the use, in the construction or installation of any pipe or water fitting, of any material or substance which is likely to cause contamination of water. We are considering whether any further steps should be taken to increase the effectiveness of the byelaws in this respect.

88. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the presence of pesticides in drinking water.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The trace amounts of pesticide found in a small proportion of United Kingdom drinking water supplies are not regarded by the Government's medical advisers as posing a danger to health. Under the water quality regulations water companies are required to carry out regular monitoring for pesticides residues and, where appropriate, to develop the technology for their removal and to investigate with the National Rivers Authority the case for restricting their use within water catchment areas.

Voluntary Sports Clubs

58. Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to introduce mandatory rate relief for voluntary sports clubs.

Mr. Atkins: Present arrangements allow local authorities to award discretionary rate relief of up to 100 per cent. to non-profit making bodies—such as voluntary sports clubs. The Government have considered mandatory rate relief, but believe that local authorities are best placed to assess the benefits that local communities derive from sports clubs and should, therefore, be allowed to tailor rate relief accordingly.

Hedgerows

59. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the legislation for the preservation of hedgerows.

Mr. Trippier: Our current review of tree preservation policies and legislation is also considering matters relating to hedgerows.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

62. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many sites of special scientific interest have been damaged or destroyed during the last seven years.

Mr. Trippier: The information is not available in the form requested. Since 1 April 1984 information on the number of SSSIs damaged is set out in the NCC's annual reports, copies of which are in the Library.

Housebuilding

68. Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the current condition of private sector housebuilding.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The most recent housebuilding statistics were published by my Department in a press release on 5 July 1990, which is in the Library.

Although the housebuilding industry is currently suffering from the effects of anti-inflationary measures, the success of those measures will provide a sound basis for its long-term prospects for growth.

74. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has developed any proposals concerning public sector housebuilding.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The task of providing new subsidised homes for rent and sale is increasingly passing to housing associations, with local authorities fulfilling an enabling role. Local authorities decide their own priorities in using the capital resources available to them, although the Government have encouraged them to concentrate on the improvement of their own stock and on assistance to private owners with grants.

Newspapers (Recycled Newsprint)

69. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what initiative he is taking to increase the use of recycled newsprint by national newspapers.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I intend to have meetings with individual newspaper publishers, newsprint manufacturers and the Newspaper Publishers Association shortly to discuss further what measures can be taken to increase the proportion of recycled paper used in newsprint.

New Territories

76. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new tenancies he estimates will be created by private landlords (a) during 1990 and (b) in 1991.

109. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new tenancies have been created by private landlords under the Housing Act 1988.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We are about to commence a detailed evaluation of the impact of deregulation and that will include an assessment of the number of tenancies so far created. There are already clear signs of increased activity in the residential letting market. We estimate that £535 million has so far been invested in business expansion scheme companies letting on assured tenancies, which should provide some 9,500 additional homes for letting.

Chlorofluorocarbons

78. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action the Government are taking in assisting developing countries to phase out the use of chlorofluorocarbons.

Mr. Trippier: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) on 18 June, column 392, and to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) on 2 July, column 418.

81. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by what date it is his policy that all non-essential use of chlorofluorocarbons in Britain should be phased out.

Mr. Trippier: Much of the non-essential use of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) has already gone. It is the Government's policy to phase out all CFC use by 1997 subject to an exemption if necessary for essential uses such as medical aerosols.

86. Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the Government's target for reducing the use of chlorofluorocarbons and other ozone-depleting substances in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: We are negotiating within the European Community for the following targets: chlorofluorocarbons—50 per cent. cut by 1992, 85 per cent. by 1995, phase-out by 1997 subject to an exemption if necessary for essential uses such as medical aerosols; halons—50 per cent. by 1995, phase-out by 2000 except for agreed essential uses; carbon tetrachloride—an 85 per cent. cut by 1992, phase-out by 2000; and methyl chloroform—freeze by 1992, 30 per cent. cut by 1995, 70 per cent. by 2000, phase-out in 2005. These targets imply faster progress than the recently agreed changes to the Montreal protocol for all the substances except halons.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his Department's current estimate of the ongoing effect of chlorofluorocarbons on the ozone layer.

Mr. Trippier: My Department has asked the stratospheric ozone review group to report as soon as possible on the likely impact on the ozone layer of the tightening of the Montreal protocol agreed at the second meeting of the parties held in London last month. Our preliminary estimate is that, if all significant users of ozone-depleting substances ratify the amended protocol, chlorine loading in the atmosphere will peak at about four parts per billion in 1997, and fall to about three parts per billion by 2040. This fall would be significantly greater if use of HCFCs is phased out between 2000 and 2040, as envisaged in the resolution agreed at the meeting.

105. Mr. Bright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received supporting the agreements reached at the London ozone conference in June on phasing out the use of chlorofluorocarbons and other ozone-depleting substances; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has recieved a number of representations supporting the agreements reached in London. He has also received a number supporting our call for a phase-out, within the European Community, of chlorofluorocarbons by 1997, subject to an exemption if necessary for essential uses such as medical aerosols.

Rivers

82. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of United Kingdom rivers are of good or fair quality; and what are the comparable figures for the rest of the European Community.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The river quality surveys carried out in 1985 throughout the United Kingdom showed that 95 per cent. of the United Kingdom's rivers were of good or fair quality. A review of river classification schemes across the European Community published in 1988 by the Water Research Centre showed that the average figure in the EC for rivers of comparable quality was 75 per cent.; the review also indicated that no other member state bettered the United Kingdom's position.

95. Mr. Lyden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to meet the chairman of the National Rivers Authority to discuss progress on improving the quality of rivers.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier) to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on Wednesday 18 July, Official Report, Volume 176, column 564.

Water Leakage

85. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take powers to require water companies to reduce the levels of leakage within their areas.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Director General of Water Services already have adequate powers under part II of the Water Act 1989 for this purpose. I would also refer to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 13 February 1990, Official Report, column 181.

Acid Rain

89. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent research he has commissioned into the effects of acid rain on trees.

Mr. Trippier: The Department has commissioned extensive studies into the effects of acid deposition and gaseous pollutants on trees, with emphasis on establishing possible mechanisms for damage and methods for early diagnosis of damage. This is part of the ongoing air pollution research programme. Recent results from this programme and from work carried out elsewhere have significantly advanced our knowledge and my Department has therefore set up a sub-group of the United Kingdom terrestrial effects review group specifically to evaluate this new information. The sub-group will report in January 1991.

Documents

90. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn), Official Report, 2 July, what steps he takes to ensure that all documentary records are properly preserved.

Mr. Chris Patten: My Department complies fully with the requirements of the Public Records Act 1958, and responds to advice from the Public Records Office on the safekeeping of documentary records.

Irish Sea Conference

94. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the Irish sea conference to be held in the Isle of Man in October.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I regularly receive correspondence from members of the public as well as parish and community councils about the Irish sea, but these have not focused particularly on the forthcoming Irish sea conference. This is being organised by the Irish sea study group which includes Government, industry, academic institutions and voluntary organisations and is supported by the Governments of both the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland.

Ozone Layer

97. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement outlining progress following the London international conference in June on the ozone layer.

Mr. Trippier: Discussions have started within the European Community on a new regulation to control ozone-depleting substances. For the chlorofluorocarbons, the Government are pressing for a phase-out date of 1997 subject to an exemption if necessary for essential uses such as medical aerosols.

Rural Housing

99. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has developed any new proposals for the creation of affordable rented housing in rural areas.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 13 December 1989 to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope), Official Report, column 711.

Action for Cities

102. Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of the action for cities programme.

Mr. Portillo: Substantial progress is being made in the regeneration of our inner cities under the Government's action for cities programme. In partnership with the private sector, substantial investment is taking place in new factories, housing, shopping centres, roads and other infrastructure, and in treating derelict land; unemployment in the 57 inner city target areas has fallen by a third since March 1988. The Government, through the city action teams and inner city task forces, are working closely with business, local government, the voluntary sector and local people to build on the progress already made and to maintain the pace of inner city regeneration.

Capital Values

104. Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received any representations in response to the capital value rating figures published by his Department on 4 April.

Mr. Portillo: Although I receive representations on many aspects of local government finance, not many have been on this aspect.

Homelessness

106. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress is being made with his Department's initiative to provide direct access to subsidised accommodation for single homeless people sleeping rough on the streets of London and other cities.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Urgent consultations are currently taking place with voluntary groups, local authorities and housing associations about the provision of direct access accommodation in London. Consideration will be given in due course to the possibility of extending the initiative to other major cities.

Landfill Sites

108. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what extra resources he will make available for the monitoring of methane gas from current and disused landfill sites.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier) on Thursday 19 July 1990 to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley), Official Report, Volume 176, column 726.

Mortgage Repossession

110. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to meet the chairman of the Building Societies Association to discuss mortgage repossession.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope), to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) on 27 June, Official Report, Vol. 175, column 265.

Beaches

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment who is responsible for deciding how many and which bathing beaches are tested each year for compliance with EEC standards.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In England this is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. In Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland it is a matter for the respective Secretaries of State. Identifications were made in consultation with the competent authorities. Local authorities and the National Rivers Authority also measure the quality of other, non-identified, waters in their area.

Integrated Pollution Control

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received from industry in respect of the introduction of integrated pollution control; what has been the nature of these representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt), on 24 July.

Southampton Buildings

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will ask an inspector from English Heritage to reassess Southampton Buildings as regards the grade II listing for part of the site.

Mr. Trippier: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the cladding removed in 1984 will be replaced on the east wing of Southampton buildings, London WC2.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 24 July 1990]: The cladding was removed in 1986 because of serious deterioration following storm damage in that year. Re-cladding was planned to start in December last year, but this had to be postponed because of funding difficulties and other maintenance priorities. It may, however, be possible to start next year.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what are the plans for Southampton buildings when the Patent Office and British library vacate the buildings;

(2) whether there are plans to redevelop the site formerly known as the great seal patent office and library.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 24 July 1990]: The last parts of the Patent Office vacated Southampton buildings in September last year. The building is expected to be occupied by British Library and others until the mid-1990s when the opportunity may occur for refurbishment or redevelopment. It is too early to say which option might be adopted.

Empty Properties

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of empty private properties which have been brought back into use since the provisions of the Housing Act 1988 came into force.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No such estimate has been made. I expect the 1990 private renters' survey, the results of which will be available next spring, to show that many landlords of all types of property have been encouraged to make them available by the 1988 Act.

Noise Pollution

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any intention to change the legislation in relation to noise pollution, in particular as it relates to noise created by parties and similar activities.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will bring forward proposals to strengthen noise pollution legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: An independently chaired working party has been meeting regularly since February to discuss noise pollution, including loud parties and neighbourhood noise. The working party's recommendations will be considered in drafting the environment White Paper and the working party's report will also be published in full. These will indicate the changes that may be needed in noise control legislation.

The Entertainments (Increased Penalties) Act received Royal Assent on 13 July. This substantially increases the penalties to fines of up to £20,000 or imprisonment for up to six months, or both, in all cases where an event is held without a licence or where a licence condition regarding the number of people who might be present is breached. In addition, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home

Secretary has proposed that magistrates should be given power under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 to confiscate profits in excess of £10,000 made by those organising illegal parties or allowing their land or premises to be used for them.

Waste Control

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make a statement concerning the role of waste regulation authorities in carrying out visits to industrial and chemical waste producers; and what plans he has to extend the advice set out in waste management paper No. 4 to include visits to industrial and commercial waste producers;

(2) what advice he has given and to whom concerning the frequency of site visits to producers of industrial and commercial waste;

(3) if he will make a statement about the financing of inspections of industrial and commercial waste producers in respect of duty of care provisions as currently outlined in the Environmental Protection Bill;

(4) what assessment he has made of the number of producers of (a) industrial and commercial waste in London and England which will be covered by duty of care provisions under the Environmental Protection Bill;

(5) what is his estimated cost for regulating producers of waste (a) in London and (b) in England.

Mr. Trippier: The Environmental Protection Bill places waste producers under a duty of care to take all reasonable steps to ensure that their waste will not be dealt with illegally. The duty will apply to all persons who produce or hold waste in the course of a business. There are around 800,000 registered companies in England and Wales, and considerably more non-registered businesses. The duty of care imposes no additional regulatory duties on local authorities, nor will it require them to visit waste producers routinely. We have no plans to include advice on visits to producers' premises in any revision of waste management paper 4, which deals with the licensing of waste management facilities, not the duty of care. General advice on the implications of the duty of care has been published in the form of a draft code of practice, to be issued under clause 33 of the Bill. It will be open to any authority or individual to prosecute any producer or holder of waste whose actions constitute a breach of the duty of care. Further advice on the steps to be taken by authorities to follow up a suspected breach of the duty will be issued in the form of a circular when the duty of care provisions are enacted. The effect of the duty of care on waste regulation authorities will be to provide, for the first time, an effective sanction against producers of waste who collaborate in the commission of existing offences. I do not foresee any need for significant extra resources to deal with this new provision.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give a revised timetable for the introduction of regulations necessary to bring into effect the powers of the Control of Pollution (Amendment) Act 1989.

Mr. Trippier: The regulations necessary to implement the Control of Pollution (Amendment) Act 1989 are being prepared with a view to their being issued for consultation later in the summer and coming into force early in 1991.

Ferro Alloys (Pollution)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has made in securing the co-operation of Ferro Alloys in Glossop in meeting the reduced target rate of 113 kg/hour by 31 August 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: No intermediate target has been set for the company. The inspectorate will continue to monitor the situation and as yet is unaware of any reasons why the target will not be met.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current hourly rate of sulphur dioxide emissions from the Ferro Alloys chimney stack in Glossop for the last six months, measured in metric terms.

Mr. Trippier: The estimated hourly rates of sulphur dioxide emissions from the Ferro Alloys chimney for the last six months are given in the table:

Month	Kg/hr sulphur dioxide
1990
January	325
February	358
March	320
April	325
May	313
June	296

Average figures are based on monthly production figures and monthly sulphur dioxide results.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will inform the Peak Park planning board of the current level of sulphur dioxide emissions from the Ferro Alloys chimney stack in Glossop: and if he will monitor the effect of sulphur dioxide emissions from that stack on the area covered by the Peak Park planning board.

Mr. Trippier: Information is available and the inspectorate will contact the Peak Park planning board to ensure that this information is made available to it on a regular basis.

HMIP does not normally carry out environmental monitoring. This is usually done by the relevant local authorities, in this case both High Peak borough council and Derbyshire Dales district council, both of which cover the Peak Park near to Glossop.

At any distance from the Glossop plant it is unlikely that any emissions from Ferro Alloys could be distinguished from other sources.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration has been given to establishing a consultation mechanism between the Nature Conservancy Council and interested parties, including sea fisheries committees and harbour authorities in relation to coastal and marine areas of high nature conservation interest.

Mr. Trippier: The Nature Conservancy Council is already consulted on a wide range of matters affecting coastal and marine areas of nature conservation interest. Nevertheless, there are a large number of conflicting interests, which raise complex legal issues, and the Government are therefore actively considering the possibility of voluntary consultation arrangements for sensitive marine areas.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the consultancy studies currently being carried out in relation to the proposed reorganisation of the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission indicating where reports, or draft reports, are yet available; and if he will place copies in the Library.

Mr. Trippier: Three consultancies have been commissioned by the Government in relation to the proposed reorganisation of the Nature Conservancy Council:

(i) a review of the staffing and organisational needs of the scientific and secretarial support unit of the joint Nature Conservation Committee. This review was carried out by the consultancy and inspection services division of HM Treasury, and is now complete;

(ii) a review by PE—International (Inbucon) of the scope for certain non-scientific services to be provided by one of the new agencies on a common basis for two or all of the successor agencies and the JNCC, which is also complete;

(iii) a study by the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency of the information systems requirements of the new agencies and the JNCC. This review is still in progress.

Although work by the consultants has finished on the two reviews at (i) and (ii) above, the reports have not yet been fully considered by the Government, existing agencies and the chairmen-designate of the new agencies and the JNCC. Copies of the reports for all three reviews will be placed in the Library of the House when the consultation procedures have been completed.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to contract out any of the functions of the Nature Conservancy Council on an agency basis following its proposed reorganisation.

Mr. Trippier: Following reorganisation it will be for the three new country councils and the joint nature conservation committee to decide in the first instance how their statutory duties and work programmes can be most efficiently discharged.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate the number of additional staff posts which are likely to be required by the Nature Conservancy Council arising from the Government's reorganisation proposals and the number of additional posts identified by the consultants PE International plc.

Mr. Trippier: Detailed work on the staffing, structure and organisation of the three new country councils, including the joint nature conservation committee, is currently being undertaken by the Government and the existing agencies, in consultation with the chairmen-designate of the new councils and the JNCC. Final figures are not yet available for the number of staff likely to be employed after reorganisation. An announcement will be made shortly.

The consultants, PE-International, were employed by NCC to estimate total resource requirements for all the new bodies based on a range of different assumptions. They did not make any recommendations about what staffing levels should be.

Birds

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when his officials last met the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds to discuss the international movement of wild birds.

Mr. Trippier: Officials are in regular touch with the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, and have met the society on several occasions during the past few years to discuss a number of matters relating to the conservation of and trade in birds.

County Hall

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the redevelopment proposals for the county hall, London SE1.

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Member to reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Ozone-depleting Chemicals

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, North (Ms. Walley), Official Report, 4 July, column 564, if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Brussels meeting on safe substitutes for ozone-depleting chemicals, held on 4 and 5 July.

Mr. Trippier: The meeting held in Brussels on 4 and 5 July was attended by representatives of the member states of the European Community including officials from my Department, DTI, HSE, the European Commission; the United States Environmental Protection Agency and European industry. It afforded a valuable opportunity for an exchange of views on the introduction of safe substitutes for ozone-depleting chemicals and their testing requirements. There was general agreement between European and United States officials on how to proceed further in the development of testing strategies and requirements for these substances.

Isotopic Fingerprinting

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his letter of 20 November 1989 B/PSO/35125/89 to the hon. Member for Linlithgow, what consideration he has given to isotopic fingerprinting as an aid to controlling trade in endangered species.

Mr. Trippier: No information about the progress of research into this technique has been forthcoming since the matter was first raised by the hon. Member, and we have thus not yet been able to make any evaluation of its potential.

Sea Outfalls

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the method, frequency and publication of analysis in monitoring the marine environment at the emission point of sea outfalls.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The available information is held on the registers maintained by the National Rivers Authority under section 117 of the Water Act 1989.

Sewage Slick (East Anglia)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action has been taken to deal with the sewage slick off the coast of East Anglia; where this slick originates from; what specific dispersal attempts there have been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am not aware of any such slick.

Weston Shore, Southampton

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he, or representatives from his Department, last met representatives of the National Rivers Authority and Southern Water with regard to Weston shore, Southampton; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My officials are in correspondence with representatives of the National Rivers Authority and of Southern Water Services Limited concerning Weston shore, Southampton. My officials are preparing a factual reply to a complaint from the Commission of the European Communities concerning water quality and use at Weston shore.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take to ensure the beach at Weston shore, Southampton, meets European Community standards.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The water is not identified under directive 76/160/EEC, so there is no obligation for it to meet that directive's standards.

Waveney Beach

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take to ensure the beach at Waveney, East Anglia, meets European Community standards.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am pleased to report that in 1989 both the identified bathing waters in Waveney met the standards for coliforms set in the bathing water directive and one, Lowestoft South, was awarded a blue flag. In addition, Southwold beach was also awarded a blue flag, although this bathing water is not at present identified under the directive.

Waveney Sewage Outfall

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals there are to extend the sewage outfall at Waveney, East Anglia; what volume of raw sewage is currently emitted through the outfall; what volume is planned through the extended outfall; and if there are proposals for full treatment sewage works to service the Waveney area.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: There are no immediate plans to extend the existing outfall at Lowestoft, which has an average flow of 30,000 cubic metres a day. We are at present discussing with the water industry the level of treatment to be provided at Lowestoft. Sewage from Southwold is already given secondary treatment.

Housing Action Trusts

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any further plans for housing action trusts.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We are having discussions with tenants and councils on possible housing action trusts in Southwark and Waltham Forest. I am ready at any time to consider proposals from councils and tenants for the use of HAT powers in other areas.

Football Trust

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions an observer from his Department has attended meetings of the Football Trust 1990 since its commencement of operations; and what has been the number of meetings at which his observer has been entitled to attend over the same period.

Mr. Atkins: An observer from the Department of the Environment has attended all three meetings of the Football Trust 1990 held since its establishment on 5 April.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions an observer from his Department attended meetings of the Football Trust after 1 July 1986 and before the establishing of the Football Trust 1990; and what was the number of meetings at which his observer was entitled to attend over the same period.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 23 July 1990]: An observer from the Department of the Environment attended all 16 meetings of the Football Trust held between 1 July 1986 and the establishment of the Football Trust 1990 on 5 April.

Warrington and Runcorn Development Corporation

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how much was paid by Warrington and Runcorn development corporation in redundancy payments to each senior officer, other than the head of department, in the marketing department;

(2) how Warrington and Runcorn development corporation assessed the appropriate fee reductions in respect of work for other clients carried out by business ventures using its property;

(3) whether Warrington and Runcorn development corporation had unrestricted access to information about what contracts the business ventures using its property had with other clients;

(4) how much was deducted from fees paid to each business venture by Warrington and Runcorn development corporation to take account of (a) the cost of gas and electricity, (b) rates and (c) the use of their property; and how these deductions were calculated;

(5) what fees were paid by Warrington and Runcorn development corporation to each business venture; and what would have been the cost of retaining these services in house in each case;

(6) if he will make it his policy for all future contracts to be awarded on the basis of competitive tendering.

Mr. Nicholls: I will write to the hon. Member.

Hazardous Waste

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on part II of the Environmental Protection Bill concerning the division of responsibilities between Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and the waste regulatory authorities for the enforcement of (a) the special waste regulations and (b) the transfrontier shipment of hazardous waste regulations with regard to waste disposal facilities subject to integrated pollution control and those not subject to integrated pollution control.

Mr. Trippier: In January 1990 we published a consultation paper reviewing the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980 and setting out the changes which we propose to make to the present arrangements. It is proposed that waste regulation authorities should continue to be responsible for the enforcemet of the revised special waste regulations which will be made in due course under part II of the Environmental Protection Bill, including those cases where special waste is consigned to a process authorised for control by HMIP under part I of the Bill. In such cases, it is proposed that waste regulation authorities should have access to and should be provided with the information necessary for them to discharge their responsibilities under the special waste regulations.

The Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988 implement directive 84/631/EEC. This directive is at present being reviewed by the European Commission in the light of the Basel convention on transboundary movements of hazardous waste. It is anticipated that the Commission may propose a regulation to replace directive 84/631/EEC. A decision on the continuing responsibilities of waste regulation authorities under the 1988 regulations will be taken in the lightof the regulation adopted by the Community.

Merryhill Tower Block (Fire)

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the fire on 13 July in the Merryhill tower block in Smethwick and the danger in other tower blocks of similar faulty contruction of fire spreading rapidly; and what remedial action he intends in similar such blocks.

Mr. Nicholls: The first step is to establish precisely what happened in the tower block at Merryhill, and to understand how the fire travelled. Sandwell council, the owner, is carrying out an urgent investigation, and experts from the fire brigade and my Department's Building Research Establishment are helping. If there are lessons to be learnt, we shall take immediate steps to see that other owners of similar buildings are informed.

Press Officers

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many press officers are employed by his Department.

Mr. Chris Patten: My Department's press office is currently staffed by 14 press officers.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Government response to the Environmental Select Committee's report on contaminated land will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Government's response is being published today and a copy has been placed in the Library. We welcome the report as a valuable contribution to the debate on contaminated land and confirm the need to safeguard against risks to human health or the environment.

In identifying areas for further assessment and action the Government have been able to accept or consider many of the Committee's recommendations. The Government response looks at the scale of the problem, analyses the need for more information on extent and location of contaminated sites and goes on to consider a suitable framework for protection and the opportunities for supporting clean-up action. This includes review of the scope for further research and evaluation.

The Government have already gone ahead with proposals in the Environmental Protection Bill for publicly accessible local authority registers of potentially contaminated land uses. A programme of work on a more comprehensive system of quality standards for dealing with contamination is now proposed; this will build upon current Government approaches to guidance, but at this stage stopping short of the statutory requirements recommended by the Committee. The Government already provide grant aid on some aspects of work on contamination and propose further to assess available technology including possible demonstration projects on the latest clean-up techniques.

Environmental Protection Bill

Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will announce the results of the consultation on the draft code of practice on the duty of care under the Environmental Protection Bill.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My Department together with the Welsh Office and the Scottish Office have considered the responses made to the consultation papers on the draft codes of practice for waste holders under the duty of care issued on 12 February in England and Wales and 22 March in Scotland.

A total of 108 responses were received in England and Wales and 41 in Scotland. Copies of those responses whose authors agreed to publication are in the libraries of the Department of the Environment, the Welsh Office and the Scottish Office for public inspection.

The overwhelming majority of comments supported the general substance of the duty of care and the draft code of practice. Points of detail and improvements to the presentation of the code will be attended to before a revised final text is issued to take effect. The Government also recognise a need for simplified explanatory material and publicity to accompany the final launch of the code.

A further consultation exercise will be launched on draft regulations governing documents to be kept under the duty. The duty of care and code of practice will then be brought into effect as soon as possible next year. It is intended to issue a single code for Great Britain.

Planning Applications

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will next increase fees for planning applications; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales intend to lay before the House after the summer recess regulations which would increase fees for planning applications by 20 per cent. The regulations would amend the Town and Country Planning (Fees for Planning Applications and Deemed Applications) Regulations 1989. If approved by the House and another place, they could come into effect by mid-November.

As proposed in the consultation paper "Efficient Planning" published last year, the Government also intend that planning application fees should cover 100 per cent. of local authorities' development control costs. My right hon. Friends intend to lay before the House further regulations over the next several years to raise fees progressively in order to achieve 100 per cent. recovery.

Deemed Planning Consent

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make a statement about the future of local authority road schemes, where county councils have no deemed planning consent powers;

(2) if he will make a statement on arrangements for county councils to fulfil their statutory waste disposal functions where they have no deemed planning consent facility;

(3) if he will make a statement about the arrangements for the emergency provision of temporary classrooms, where county councils have no deemed planning consent powers;

(4) what plans he has for deemed planning consent powers for both district and county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer [holding answer 16 July 1990]: I announced on 7 February, in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) (Official Report, Vol. 166, column 638) that I had issued a consultation paper seeking views on proposals to amend the Town and Country Planning General Regulations 1976. Among the proposed changes was that councils should in future be required to apply for planning permission like any other applicant, for any development where they were not the responsible development control authority. Under this proposal, county councils would, for example, have been required to seek planning permission from district councils for road schemes and to provide temporary classrooms, although not for waste disposal development because for that the county council is the responsible local planning authority.

The consultation paper, "Local Authorities' Deemed Planning Permission" provoked 275 responses of which 70 per cent. were broadly in favour of the Government's proposals. The proposal to require county councils to seek planning permission from district councils was criticised for its unfairness to county councils and the difficulties they would have fulfilling their statutory functions.

The Government have considered carefully these criticisms, and we have decided to implement modified proposals as follows. In the case of local authorities' own development, whether on their own land or elsewhere, the present arrangements for deemed permission will continue, subject to three specific safeguards. We shall require such a proposal to be fully advertised; to be determined in public by a committee not responsible for managing or disposing of land or buildings owned by the authority; and, if the development proposal conflicts with the development plan, we shall require it to be reported to my right hon. Friend or to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales to enable them to consider calling in the proposal for their own decision.

These safeguards will also apply to development proposals by other parties on land owned by local authorities, but for these proposals we shall in future require planning permission to be sought from the responsible local planning authority; we shall make appropriate similar arrangements for national park special boards and planning committees.

Only the last of these proposals requires primary legislation, for which an early opportunity will be sought. We intend to achieve the remaining proposals by means of secondary legislation .

The Government believe that these modified proposals represent a useful reform that will increase the accountability of local authorities when deeming themselves planning permission and will enable their probity to be publicly demonstrated.

Pollution

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that the guidance notes being prepared by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution for part A and B processes of the Environmental Protection Bill are comprehensive in respect of what constitutes excessive cost; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 18 July, column 569]: The notes for the part B processes, which it is intended will come under local authority air pollution control, will contain detailed guidance for local authorities on the standards of control which constitute the best available techniques not entailing excessive cost, including time scales for the upgrading of existing processes. The notes will be issued by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State; under clause 7(11) of the Bill, local authorities will be required to have regard to this guidance.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 26 July 1990

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

City Fraud

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Attorney-General what discussions he has held recently with the Director of Public Prosecutions about City fraud; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I frequently meet the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss matters of departmental interest. However, as I said in my answer to the hon. Member on 9 July 1990, primary responsibility for the prosecution of commercial fraud rests with the Serious Fraud Office. I met the director of the Serious Fraud Office on Monday 16 July to discuss matters of departmental interest.

"Statutes in Force"

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Attorney-General if he will state the dates to which Her Majesty's Stationery Office's publication "Statutes in Force" applies (a) in respect of new statutes and (b) in respect of repeals and amendments.

The Attorney-General: As to new statutes, all relevant Acts which received Royal Assent before 24 May 1990 have been duly published in "Statutes in Force". Information on the repeal of whole Acts is up to date to 29 June 1990, and amended Acts in "Statutes in Force" are up to date to various extents ranging from 1 January 1983 to 1 May 1990.

Political Advisers

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the political advisers and public relations advisers currently employed to advise Ministers in his Department, including those persons paid by other organisations and seconded to the Government, giving in every case the source of payment, rate of salary and expenses.

The Attorney-General: No political advisers or public relations advisers are currently employed to advise Ministers in any of the Departments for which I am responsible.

THE ARTS

Natural History Museum

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he intends to publish the corporate plan of the natural history museum.

Mr. Mellor: I am pleased to say that the museum published its corporate plan in April and copies are available from the museum on request.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the names of those local authorities known to him that have set their standard community charge multiplier at less than twice the personal community charge in respect of properties unoccupied for more than (a) three months, (b) six months and (c) 12 months.

Mr. Nicholls: I am arranging for this information to be placed in the Library of the House.

Krypton 85

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department has carried out into Krypton 85 before authorising its release into the atmosphere in 1992; what regulations apply to Krypton 85; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Discharges of radioactive gas into the atmosphere are regulated by authorisations issued under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960. My Department has supported research into immobilisation of Krypton 85 for purposes of disposal. Applicants for an authorisation are required to justify their proposals with reference to their own research results where appropriate. No application for such an authorisation to be granted in 1992 has been received. All applications are carefully assessed by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution before authorisations are granted.

BISF Houses

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations the Minister for Housing has received from the hon. Member for Nottingham, North requesting a meeting regarding BISF houses; and when he will reply.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State replied to the hon. Member's request in his letter of 29 March 1990.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the implications of the Parnham report "BISF Houses: An Assessment of Condition", for the policies of his Department.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My Department has not seen this report, which we understand has been commissioned privately.

European Environment Agency

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met his European Community counterparts to discuss the issue of the development of a European environment agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I discussed the European environment agency with EC Environment Ministers and their counterparts in eastern Europe in Dublin on 16 June 1990. The progress made in adopting the regulation on the agency was welcomed. The regulation takes actual effect when a decision on the siting of the agency is made.

Radioactive Waste

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department has reviewed its policy on radioactive waste management and storage following the publication of the European Commission's proposals for radioactive waste management and storage.

Mr. Trippier: The 19th report of the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities broadly endorsed the Government's policy on radioactive waste management and storage. No further review was therefore required.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what controls govern the disposal of radioactive waste to the dustbin by local authority collection; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The disposal of radioactive waste with domestic refuse system is controlled by the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 (RSA 60). Unless exempted by way of an order issued under RSA 60 any such disposal requires authorisation.

House Renovation Grants

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the reasons for the delay in publishing the regulations on the house renovation grants scheme; what is the average interlude between the publication of regulations and the starting of a scheme; and what representations he has had from (a) local authorities and (b) others on this matter.

Mr. Nicholls: The Housing Renovation etc. Grants (Reduction of Grant) Regulations 1990 (S.I. No. 1189) were not laid before Parliament until 8 June as they had been the subject of an extensive consultation exercise. It was necessary to take account of comments received from consultees before the regulations could be finalised. Information is not available on the average time taken between the publication of regulations and the start of a scheme and it could be collected only at disproportionate cost. Since the regulations were laid my Department has received two representations from local authorities and 13 from hon. Members.

Water Charges

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the water companies that have had complaints sent to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission over the cost of water pipes to new homes since privatisation; and if he will list the complaints received, by company.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Complaints about the actions of, and charges imposed by, water and sewage undertakers fall to be dealt with in the first instance by the customer service committees established by the Director General of Water Services. Reference of any individual complaint to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission is a matter for decision by the director general.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the amount charged by individual water companies for connection to the water system for (a) new homes and (b) new businesses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Section 79 of the Water Act 1989 enables water and sewage undertakers to levy charges to cover the cost of additional infrastructure required to meet the demands of new customers. The initial limits, which were set by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, are listed in the table. These charges are payable on the provision of new supplies or sewerage services for domestic purposes and are in addition to the longstanding arrangements for the provision of local infrastructure through requisitioning payments and connection charges.

Fire Regulations

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the implications of the report by Bickerdike Allen Partners on fire and building regulations on the changes recommended in building requirements affecting fire safety regulations.

Mr. Nicholls: A consultation paper containing proposals for amendments to part B, "Safety in Fire", of the Building Regulations 1985 was issued in March. Responses are now being considered. A number of those who have responded, including the Royal Institute of British Architects, the British Institute of Architectural Technicians, the Association of Structural Fire Protection Contractors and Manufacturers, the Gypsum Products Development Association, and Cape Building Products Ltd., have referred to the recommendations made in the review of fire and building regulations undertaken by Bickerdike Allen Partners. These recommendations have already been accepted by the Government, and are in the course of being implemented. The part B proposals take account of them, and the two documents are intended to form a complementary approach to the improvement of fire safety in buildings.

Planning Policy Guidance

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the planning policy guidance note, "The Countryside and the Environment", is to be published.

Mr. Spicer: The publication date has not yet been set. More than 400 responses were received to the consultation draft.

Agricultural Dwellings

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he intends to take to ensure that agricultural dwellings erected in accordance with the advice given in the annex to circular 24/73 are occupied by farmers or farm workers engaged in a financially viable agricultural practice.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Local planning authorities have extensive enforcement powers if an agricultural dwelling is occupied in breach of an agricultural occupancy condition.

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will consider publishing new guidance encouraging local planning authorities to restrict the occupation of agricultural dwellings to persons working on the land identified in the planning permission.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This, and other suggestions, are under consideration with a view to publishing new guidance in the final version of the planning policy guidance note on the countryside and the rural economy.

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has received concerning abuse of the special privilege given to agricultural workers' dwellings in the annex to circular 24/73.

Mr. Michael Spicer: A number of responses to the consultation draft of the planning policy guidance note on the countryside and the rural economy commented on this point, and the Council for the Protection of Rural England has sent me a copy of its recent report, "A Place in the Country".

Housing Associations

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details for each local housing authority for 1989-90 of (a) the estimated expenditure by housing associations, (b) the actual expenditure by housing associations, (c) the estimated number of completed housing units by housing associations, (d) the actual number of completed housing units by housing associations and (e) the extent of overspending by housing associations.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This matter is for the Housing Corporation. I have asked the corporation to respond to the hon. Member direct.

Capital Receipts

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will lift restrictions preventing local authorities from diverting money from capital receipts into the building of homes.

Mr. Portillo: The rules under which local authorities set aside a reserved part of their capital receipts as provision for credit liabilities enable resources to be targeted more effectively on need. Local authorities are free to use all the usable part of their capital receipts for capital expenditure on any service.

Women's Temporary Accommodation

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to ensure that women going into temporary accommodation will have the choice of accommodation with high security and women only if that is what they wish.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The choice of temporary accommodation made available to any household accepted as homeless under the homelessness legislation is a matter for each local authority. Local authorities should seek to ensure that the type of accommodation offered is appropriate to the circumstances of each individual household.

Homelessness

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research has been undertaken into the relationship between the breakup of family relationships and homelessness, temporary accommodation and bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The results of a major national study of homelessness and temporary accommodation carried out for the Department by the university of Birmingham's centre for urban and regional studies was published last year. My Department has also commissioned the university of York to carry out a study of the housing effects of relationship breakdown; this will be completed in 1992. Results of the first stage have already been published.

Bed-and-Breakfast Accommodation

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how the community charge will be collected from homeless families, eligible for an 80 per cent. rebate, who have been placed in temporary accommodation in another borough; and if he will estimate the administrative cost of the housing benefit being assessed by the placing authority and the community charge being collected by the receiving authority.

Mr. Portillo: Generally the sole or main residence of such families would be expected to move to the receiving authority and the community charge would be paid at the new address. If the accommodation was designated for the collective charge, payments would be made to the receiving authority through the landlord, otherwise, payments would be made directly to the authority. Information is not available in the detail requested on cost of housing benefit administration or collection of the community charge.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures will be taken to ensure that families in bed-and-breakfast or temporary accommodation receive adequate information regarding the collection of the community charge and advising them of rebates available; and what safeguards there will be to ensure the confidentiality of financial information for those people and families whose tax is collected under a collective charge.

Mr. Portillo: Advice has been given to local authorities in community charge practice notes 14 and 21. The landlord of a collective charge property will not need to hold information other than the names of qualifying individuals, the periods during which they are resident and the amounts payable by way of contribution for each day by the individuals, These records may be inspected by the local authority. A community charge benefit claimant will have his or her benefit paid by the authority either directly or by way of a voucher. There is no need for the landlord of a collective charge property to hold separate information about an individual's financial status.

Caravan Sites

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance he has given to local authorities as to whether they should send out community charge bills or uniform business rate bills in respect of those caravans on protected sites whose status he has announced his intention to clarify by means of further legislation.

Mr. Nicholls: The Department wrote to all charging authorities in England on 30 March informing them of the reply given that day to my hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) (Official Report, columns 346-47). In view of the proposed requirement on charging authorities to refund any payments of the standard charge in respect of caravans on protected sites, the letter drew to authorities' attention the need to consider to what extent they wished to take steps to collect the standard charge. It is my impression that most authorities have chosen not to levy a standard charge in these cases.

Pollution, London

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many monitoring points for assessing the levels and effects of automobile exhaust pollution exist in the Greater London area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Warren Spring laboratory operates, under contract to my Department, three Greater London sites monitoring the levels of air pollution, the majority of which is caused by road transport.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) on how many occasions in the current year the concentrations of gases produced from the photochemical decomposition of exhaust emissions in London have exceeded safety levels as designated by the EEC and other international standards;

(2) what information he has about the measured concentrations of ground level ozone and benzene in the Greater London area during the current spell of hot weather; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will make a statement about the level of photochemical smog in London during July.

Mr. Trippier: The Government release data from the United Kingdom national ozone monitoring network should any two sites measure an exceedance of a 60ppb (parts per billion) hourly average, which is considerably more stringent than the World Health Organisation guide value for ozone of 76-100 ppb. There are currently no comparable EC guide values. Data from the network covering the London area are given below.

Date	Number of hours over 60ppb	Maximum levels
5 May 1990	6	88
6 May 1990	6	79
17 June 1990	4	67
15 July 1990	1	64
20 July 1990	3	74
21 July 1990	6	88

Modelling studies suggest that peak kerbside and urban background benzene concentrations are in the order of 60ppb and 6ppb respectively. There are no international guide values for benzene.

By the end of 1992, and to comply with EC legislation, new cars will be fitted with catalytic converters, cutting the emissions of the ozone precursors nitrogen oxides and hydrocarbons, including benzene, by more than 80 per cent. Since road transport is the major source of these pollutants in urban areas, these measures will lead to substantial improvements in all aspects of urban air quality.

Public Inquiries

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those members of the panel of independent inspectors who are currently available to hold public inquiries in England and Wales into road schemes, with their ages, qualifications, and last two previous professional appointments.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I will write to the hon. Member.

Shire Counties (Expenditure)

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total estimated expenditure per head for each shire county for 1990.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is as follows:

	Net revenue expenditure per head of relevant population 1990-91
Avon	750
Bedfordshire	778
Berkshire	732
Buckinghamshire	741

	Net revenue expenditure per head of relevant population 1990-91

Local Government Reform

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what reductions in expenditure (a) in central Goverment and (b) in local government have been achieved arising from the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The projected long-term annual saving resulting from staff savings following abolition of the GLC and metropolitan county councils is estimated at £100 million.

Pollution Inspectors

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the annual report of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution district inspectors for 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to publish HMIP's annual report for 1988-89 next month.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which of the district offices of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution he intends to run down, close or relocate; where he intends to maintain existing staffing levels at Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution district offices; and whether staff who leave district offices or are transferred will be replaced with staff of equal grade.

Mr. Trippier: Staff in Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution have been informed that regional offices in Bedford, Bristol and Leeds will be the focus of the development of its regional structure. Sub-offices in Cardiff, Lancaster and London will be retained. Staff leaving or transferring from present offices in Lincoln, Luton, Chelmsford, East Grinstead, Sheffield, Darlington, Preston, Chester and Birmingham will not be replaced at those offices. The need for, and location of, further sub-offices will be considered carefully when regional offices are staffed up to complement.

Shire Counties (Manpower)

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of people employed in (a) the fire services and (b) the library service in the shire counties in 1990.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is as follows:

Non-metropolitan counties in England

	Full-time	Part-time	Total staff
(a) Fire service (Regulars and Others)	20,032	1,296	21,328
(b) Public Libraries and Museums	10,344	11,648	21,992

Source: Joint staffing watch for England, March 1990 survey.

Political Advisers

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the political advisers and public relations advisers currently employed to advise Ministers in his Department, including those persons paid by other organisations and seconded to the Government, giving in every case the source of payment, rate of salary and expenses.

Mr. Chris Patten: Professor D. Pearce is my special (economic) adviser on environmental matters and Mr. P. J. Rock is my special (political) adviser. Mr. R. Marsh is special (political) adviser to the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities, the Minister for Housing and Planning, and the Minister for the Environment and Countryside.

It is not the practice to give information about the salaries of individual advisers as they are negotiated in relation to previous outside earnings and are therefore confidential. The normal civil service rules apply to expenses and each adviser may be provided with secretarial assistance.

No public relations advisers are currently employed by my Department, nor are there any special advisers on secondment.

County Hall, London

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement regarding the future of county hall, London SE1.

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave on 24 July to my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis).

Council Houses (Defects)

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from or on behalf of people who bought council houses and have been unable to resell them since the Building Research Establishment issued a report in 1987 alleging defects in large panel system dwellings and building societies have refused to accept mortgage risks on such properties; what action he is taking to deal with the situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My Department has received a number of representations about the mortgageability of dwellings built from large panels, and we commissioned our Building Research Establishment to carry out a major study to establish the facts about the structural adequacy and durability of such buildings. That study revealed no general problem of structural safety. We published the report in 1987, and drew it to the attention of major lending institutions, who have confirmed that it is their policy to grant mortgages on large panel system dwellings, judging each building on its merits, in the same way as they do dwellings of more traditional construction.

Local Authorities (Costs)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, pursuant to his duty of monitoring all new costs imposed on local authorities by Ministers, he will publish, by Department, a list giving the estimate of all such costs in the financial years 1990-91 and 1991-92, subdivided pursuant to (a) Acts passed since 31 July 1989, (b) statutory instruments coming into force since 31 July 1989 and (c) departmental circulars issued since 31 July 1989.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the major new burdens falling to local government in 1990-91 include: community charge collection, the implementation of the Children Act, new initiatives in waste disposal management, and the structural maintenance of bridges after existing EC derogation in respect of lorry weights ends in 1999.

The major new burdens falling to local government in 1991-92 will include the first phase of community care, the expansion of responsibilities relating to mental illness, the code of practice on litter, and new responsibilities arising from the Environmental Protection Bill and the Food Safety Bill.

The best estimates of the costs of these burdens, plus savings resulting from improvements in efficiency or the removal of responsibilities, were taken into account, along with all other relevant factors, when we set the levels of total standard spending for the respective years.

Tanhouse Estate, Skelmersdale

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant he is proposing to make to the West Lancashire district council to upgrade the Tanhouse estate in Skelmersdale under the estate programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Estate Action resources to improve the Tanhouse estate have been provisionally earmarked as follows:

1990-91	1·150
1991-92	1·019
1992-93	1·00
Total	3·169

Final approval is subject to agreement on a detailed scheme.

Councillors (Allowances)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the operation of the local authority members' allowance scheme introduced under the provisions of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.

Mr. Portillo: Yes. We have already agreed with the local authority associations, in discussing the proposed new system, that there will be a review of its working after about a year.

Housing Act 1988

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has as to when Westminster council will complete the evaluation of the Walterton and Elgin estate in the matter of the application by the tenants of the estate to change their landlord under the tenants' choice provisions of the Housing Act 1988;

(2) if he will take action to ensure that Westminster council does not delay further in processing the applications by tenants of the Walterton and Elgin estates to change their landlord under the tenants' choice provisions of the Housing Act 1988;

(3) what information he has on the reasons for the delay by Westminster council in processing the application by tenants of the Walterton and Elgin estate to change their landlord under the tenants' choice provisions of the Housing Act 1988.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Under the tenants' choice provisions of the Housing Act 1988, the local authority has eight weeks to notify the applicant landlord of the price it considers should be paid for the property. Extensions to this period are a matter between the local authority and the applicant landlord, and the Secretary of State has no locus in the matter. I understand that in the case of the Walterton and Elgin estate in Westminster the reasons for the delay are being discussed by the parties concerned, and I hope that the outstanding issues can be speedily resolved.

Sewage Treatment

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment has been made by his Department of the Oxymaster sewage treatment system in regard to the implementation of technological improvements to meet European Community standards on sewage treatment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My officials have discussed the Oxymaster system in detail with representatives of the manufacturers. However, it is not our practice to recommend one commercial product rather than other alternative products.

Nitrogen Oxides

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, on 17 July Official Report, column 499, when he expects to receive the final report into evaluation of nitrogen oxide abatement technologies for large combustion plant; and if he will place a copy in the Library on receipt.

Mr. Trippier: My Department expects to receive a final report on NOx abatement technologies for large combustion plant early in the autumn. Consideration will then be given to placing it in the Library.

Antarctica

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if Antarctic conservation is to be addressed by the environment White Paper.

Mr. Trippier: The White Paper will deal with a wide range of international environment issues, including the environment in the polar regions.

Disabled People (Housing)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has or plans to commission any independent research into the housing needs of disabled people and the extent to which those needs are currently being met; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The Department has commissioned Ernst and Young management consultants to carry out an independent study of the housing needs of elderly and disabled people. They began work on the research this month and aim to complete it in the spring of 1992.

Solvent-free Paint

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department or Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has evaluated the benefits to reduced pollution of the development of solvent-free paint; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Harwell laboratory and the Warren Spring laboratory are making a study of volatile organic compounds and their effects under contract to my Department. These studies include the benefits from reducing solvent content of paints.

Mains Water (Connection)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce a system of interim relief in respect of payments for connection to mains water supplies.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We first announced proposals for the introduction of water and sewerage infrastructure charges in May 1989. Introduction was delayed until 1 April 1990. My right hon. Friend has no plans at present to introduce further transitional arrangements.

Hostel Deficit Grants

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether it is his policy to increase the number of hostel deficit grants.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning has been considering proposals put to him by the Housing Corporation for replacing hostel deficit grant by a flat-rate allowance. He wrote to the corporation and the National Federation of Housing Associations on 25 July announcing his decision that the allowance should be introduced for new schemes from next April and extended, or equivalent arrangements applied, to existing schemes as soon as practicable. The new grant system should be seen as transitional, since it will need to be kept under review in the light of the evolution of the care in the community policy.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff are employed by the Nature Conservancy Council's Great Britain headquarters for the purposes of processing grant applications; and what number will be required to do this work following the Nature Conservancy Council's reorganisation.

Mr. Trippier: Seven people are currently employed to process grant applications at the Great Britain headquarters of the Nature Conservancy Council. I cannot yet say how many staff may be allocated to this work following reorganisation as staffing levels for the new conservation agencies are still under consideration.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those persons or organisations that have been consulted over the future funding requirements of the Nature Conservancy Council or the Countryside Commission.

Mr. Trippier: Discussions about the future funding requirements of the successor bodies to the present Nature Conservancy Council and Countryside Commission are taking place between the relevant Government Departments, the existing agencies and the chairmen-designate of the new bodies.

Polychlorinated Biphenyls

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he is liaising with the department of chemical engineering at Bath university over research into alternative methods of disposing of polychlorinated biphenyls;

(2) if he will fund research being carried out by the department of chemical engineering at Bath university into alternative methods of disposing of polychlorinated biphenyls.

Mr. Trippier: There are no formal liaison arrangements with the department of chemical engineering at Bath university on research into alternative methods of disposing of polychlorinated biphenyls. Officials in my Department are aware of the work going on there and Professor Thomas is on the mailing list for the environmental protection technology scheme which the Department funds. I am not aware of any recent approach by the university to fund the research being carried out there, but I am happy to consider, in the usual way, any research proposals which the university cares to make.

Air Pollution

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies have been undertaken by his Department into the use of lichen to assess the extent of air pollution.

Mr. Trippier: My Department is currently commissioning a review of the use of lichens as one possible method of assessing the extent of air pollution in the United Kingdom. The results of this research will be published in due course.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the deadline for compliance set by the European Community's directive on sulphur dioxide emissions from large construction plants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The deadline for achieving a 60 per cent. reduction on 1980 levels of sulphur dioxide emission levels from existing large combustion plants in the United Kingdom is 2003.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what projects are currently funded by his Department to study air pollution.

Mr. Trippier: My Department's research programme on air pollution currently funds over 40 projects. This programme is reviewed in the Department of the Environment report on research and development 1986-88. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House. This review contains a full list of research reports and papers produced and is currently being updated.

Environmental Management

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met his United States counterpart to discuss issues of environmental management.

Mr. Trippier: During the London meeting of the parties to the Montreal protocol in June I was able to discuss a wide range of international environmental issues with Willian Reilly, administrator of the United States Environmental Protection Agency.

Radioactive Discharges (Sellafield)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations his Department has received from the Governments of the Republic of Ireland, Norway, the Faroe Islands, Sweden and Denmark, regarding radioactive discharges from the Sellafield nuclear installation.

Mr. Trippier: I will write to the hon. Member.

Sports Council

Mr. Andrew Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what budget his Department has set for allocation to the Sports Council for use in the prevention and detection of drugs in sport.

Mr. Atkins: Government grant in aid to the Sports Council for 1990-91 is £43·747 million. The Sports Council allocates this according to its priorities. I understand that it has allocated £600,000 for its drugs testing programme in 1990-91.

Water Pollution

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has had any discussions with Yorkshire Water about pollution of the River Aire in Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is for the National Rivers Authority, as the body primarily responsible for the control of water pollution, to pursue local issues with dischargers, including, where appropriate, water and sewerage undertakers.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what requirements exist in respect of the fitting of non-return valves to household equipment so as to prevent pollution from water syphoning back into the mains supply.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Water byelaws are in force throughout the United Kingdom that require household equipment to be fitted with non-return valves or other no less effective devices to prevent the pollution of water from water syphoning back into mains supply.

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to fully implement the recommendations of the 1981 Commission on Energy and the Environment regarding ferruginous discharges into rivers and streams.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Following the commission's recommendations, discharges of waste water from active mine workings—including ferruginous discharges—were brought within the pollution control system for the first time upon implementation by this Goverment of part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974. The relevant provisions have been substantially re-enacted in the Water Act 1989.

Discharges from abandoned mine workings do however present particular difficulties, as the commission recognised. The ownership of many such workings is unknown and cannot be traced. The National Rivers Authority has been considering the extent of these problems in England and Wales and we shall be discussing further with the authority how they might best be tackled.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, on 19 July Official Report, column 725, how many authorisations (a) were granted and (b) were in force for discharges of radioactive waste to the public sewer in 1989 in (i) England, (ii) Wales, (iii) Greater London and (iv) East Sussex.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the Department's "List of Premises in England and Wales currently authorised under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. This lists the authorisations in force at April 1988. The detailed information requested by the hon. Member can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the results of the National Rivers Authority's review of discharge consents and compliance assessment will be made public.

Mr. Trippier: The National Rivers Authority has today published its review of the discharge consent system. The aim of the review is to ensure that the system serves to protect water quality and is effective in enabling pollution control standards to be enforced. I therefore welcome the review as a major and important contribution in this difficult and technical area. It will help to provide a sound basis for the authority's future work in securing lasting improvements in the water environment.

The National Rivers Authority has published its review in order that interested parties should have the opportunity to comment on the proposals, before decisions are taken about implementation. I look forward to hearing from the authority what conclusions it draws in the light of the comments it receives.

Urban Development Corporations

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library the guidelines given to chairmen and members of urban development corporations where a conflict of interests may arise.

Mr. Portillo: The guidelines are designed to ensure that the duties of urban development corporation chairmen and board members do not conflict with their private interests.

Chairmen are required to sign undertakings which reflect their particular circumstances. If they are involved with companies that might otherwise operate in the urban development area they will normally be required to confirm that the companies will not so operate during the term of their appointment.

Other board members must declare to the board their private interests which might give rise to a conflict. If a particular case gives rise to a possible conflict of interest, the member is required to write in advance to the chairman and it is for the other board members to decide what action to take. Unless the interest is trivial, the member would normally withdraw from the discussion and not vote on it.

Specialised Housing

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, for each local authority in England, the number of (a) sheltered housing units, (b) wheelchair housing units and (c) mobility housing units provided, together with the number of units in each category started in each year from 1981 to 1988-89.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Local authorities report the numbers of sheltered dwellings and wheelchair dwellings in their areas in their annual housing investment programme returns (HIP1). The latest figures are for April 1989 and appear in columns A2a1 and A2c1 (local authority owned sheltered and wheelchair dwellings respectively), A2a2 and A2c2 (housing association), A2a3 and A2c3 (other public sector) and A2a4 and A2c4 (private sector) of HIP1 all items print (1989), a copy of which is in the Library. Mobility dwellings are not identified separately from the general housing stock.

The publication "Local Housing Statistics—England and Wales" gives information for individual local authorities in England about the numbers of sheltered dwellings for the elderly started each year and about the numbers of wheelchair and of mobility dwellings for the chronically sick and disabled started each year.

The issue and table numbers that show these data for calendar years from 1981 to 1988 are as follows:

Tables numbers for :	Issue number of "Local Housing Statistics	Sheltered dwellings	Wheelchair and mobility dwellings
[1][2]1981	62	11	11
[1]1982	66	7(a)	7(b)

1986	82	10	11
1987	86	10	11
1988	90	12	13

[1] Tables in issues 62 to 78 show dwellings for the elderly: with warden; and dwellings for chronically sick and disabled: specially designed and mobility.

[2] Figures for dwellings for the elderly: with warden, for period July 1980 to December 1981 are shown in table 7(a) issue number 66.

Shire Counties (Education)

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total estimated expenditure on tertiary education in all shire counties for 1990; and what was the total actual expenditure on tertiary education in all shire counties in 1985.

Mr. Nicholls: The available information is as follows. The figures are not on a comparable basis because of changes in the definition of local authority expenditure in 1990-91 and because polytechnics were transferred from the local authority sector in 1989-90.

Radioactive Waste Management

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the participation of the United Kingdom in the International Atomic Energy Agency's radioactive waste management advisory programme.

Mr. Trippier: The United Kingdom participates fully in the radioactive waste management advisory programme of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings have taken place between officials of his Department, and other United Kingdom experts, and members of the International Atomic Energy Agency in furthering its radioactive waste management advisory programme in each year since 1987, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My Department is represented on the international radioactive waste management advisory committee of the International Atomic Energy Agency which meets at least every two years. In addition, my officials and United Kingdom experts attend many advisory groups and other ad hoc meetings of the agency each year.

Common Land

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will bring forward detailed proposals on common land.

Mr. Trippier: On 29 January 1987 the then Minister for the Environment, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) made a statement accepting the case for legislation on common land, at a suitable opportunity when parliamentary time permitted, based broadly on the recommendations of the Countryside Commission's common land forum.

The common lands of England and Wales represent one of our most valuable environmental assets. They include some of our most scenically attractive areas. They are often of great importance for nature conservation. Much common land comprises vital habitat for birds and other wildlife, particularly ground nesting birds protected by the EC birds directive. Although usually in private ownership, common land is often used by the general public as a way of enjoying the countryside.

The aim of our policy is to safeguard the status of common land and to strengthen the ways in which we protect and use it. There are three main requirements.

First, while we welcome the recent House of Lords judgment in the Hazeley Heath case, there remain weaknesses in the legislation governing the registration of common land. As well as ensuring that land correctly registered as common retains that status, we need to be able to remove land that was registered in error.

Secondly, we need new arrangements to ensure that common land is properly managed, in the interests of those who own the land and those who have commoners' rights over it, and to preserve its conservation value.

Thirdly, there is scope to improve public access to common land. The arrangements for this must take account of the particular characteristics of individual commons. The forum recommended that there should be a general right of access to all common land, except where an agreed management scheme provides otherwise. In most cases there will be no reason why the public should not have free access, as already applies in urban areas. In some cases, however, particularly where commons are important for conservation or where increased access would adversely affect other existing uses, the arrangements for access will need to safeguard those interests. In these cases this could best be achieved by extensions of the public rights of way system.

We believe that in the great majority of cases it should be possible for all interests concerned to reach agreement locally on arrangements that will provide for better management and improved public access. In any case where a management association is unable to reach agreement, we propose that the matter should be referred to the Secretary of State for the Environment for decision; in such cases existing arrangements would remain in force pending this decision.

I believe that these proposals, prepared after extensive consultations, will command widespread acceptance. I will now be embarking on detailed discussions with those most directly involved to work out how to deal with the practical problems that remain.

Minerals and Waste Disposal

Mr. Madel: To ask the secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about decisions by county councils on minerals and waste disposal planning applications.

Mr. Atkins: Following a study which the Department undertook jointly in 1988 with the Association of County Councils, statistics have been collected quarterly on the decisions taken by county planning authorities on minerals and waste disposal applications. In future, these statistics will be published alongside those reporting decisions taken by district councils, to provide a comprehensive picture on local authorities' development control performance. County matter decisions will also be published annually with other development control statistics.

I am concerned that there are increasing delays in giving decisions on county matter planning applications. My Department will consult on possible improvements to the system, notably the introduction of a standard planning application form for minerals proposals, and possible legislation to enable county matter applications to be made direct to county councils rather than via district councils. It will also commission research into the use made of section 52 agreements generally, including ways in which the conclusion of such agreements might be speeded up.

Both industry and county planning authorities can help in a number of ways. Industry should ensure that applications are accompanied at the outset by sufficient supporting information to enable the application to be determined. Also, operators are strongly urged to discuss their proposals informally with the planning authority at the earliest possible stage before the application is submitted. Similarly, early discussion with the appropriate statutory bodies is recommended to resolve any conflicts of interest and establish what information should accompany the full application.

I look to county councils to make every effort to improve their performance. In particular, they should target applications for consideration at an early meeting of the planning committee. They should also seek prompt responses to the consultations that they are obliged to carry out with other bodies.

Pollution Control Appeals

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the appeals under section 10 of the Control of Pollution Act 1976 currently under consideration, showing the dates when they were first lodged; how many decisions have been issued since 3 January; and if he will make a statement on the time taken for these appeals to be determined.

Mr. Trippier: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Councillors

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the implementation of sections 9, 13, and 15 to 18 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be making an order commencing from 1 August 1990 for England and Wales, the provisions of sections 9, 13, and 15 to 17 of, and schedule 1 to, the 1989 Act. These deal with assistants to political groups, the voting rights of co-opted members of local authority committees, and the requirements for pro rata representation on committees and other bodies. He, together with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, will be laying the necessary regulations before Parliament, to come into effect on the same day. The necessary order under section 9 is also being made to come into force in due course. Separate regulations dealing with pro rata representation on sub-committees of county police committees will be laid in due course.

The Government are, however, still taking advice on certain aspects of the regulations to introduce the new system of councillors' allowances in England and Wales, and more time is needed to resolve these. A further announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Rented Housing (Code of Practice)

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has approved the draft code of practice in rented housing submitted to him by the Commission for Racial Equality.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have approved the draft code of practice and I am laying it before both Houses today.

Housing (Conservation Areas)

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses fall within (a) the designated conservation areas and (b) the designated areas of outstanding natural beauty.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Satellite Television

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many responses he has had to date to the consultation paper "Permitted Development Rights for Satellite Television Antennae"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: I will write to my Friend.

Bottle Banks

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the proportion of bottle banks per head of population in each London borough.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 25 July 1990]: Information supplied by the British Glass Manufacturers Confederation shows the following situation at the end of March 1990 for bottle bank sites that are accessible to the public:

Borough	Population per bottle bank site
Barking	16,400
Barnet	60,280
Bexley	18,370
Brent	42,870
Bromley	29,820
Camden	12,170
City of Westminster	5,660
Croydon	19,830
Ealing	21,240

Hackney	26,990
Hammersmith and Fulham	9,350
Haringey	8,010
Harrow	12,320
Havering	14,730
Hillingdon	21,080
Hounslow	19,080
Islington	10,580
Kensington and Chelsea	13,960
Kingston upon Thames	16,810
Lambeth	18,420
Lewisham	9,540
Merton	11,720
Newham	20,700
Redbridge	14,430
Richmond upon Thames	8,460
Southwark	27,130
Sutton	10,510
Tower Hamlets	23,110
Waltham Forest	26,660
Wandsworth	32,140

There are no bottle banks in the City of London.

Motorway Service Areas

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, when he consults about proposed motorway service area applications made under circular 18/84 after he has received the inspector's report on an inquiry into a Department of Transport motorway service area proposal.

Mr. Atkins: The timing and extent of any consultations will depend on the circumstances of the case, but it is customary to notify the developing Department of the proposed decision.

Community Charge

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce regulations to remove the need for chargepayers to inform community charge registration offices of their new home address or a forwarding address whenever they move to a new charging authority area; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no intention to remove the requirement for chargepayers to inform the CCRO for the area concerned of their new address. Individuals may volunteer a forwarding address to the CCRO for an area in which they no longer reside, so that they can receive confirmation that their original register entry in that area has been deleted, but they are under no obligation to do so.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance is issued to local authorities about the collection of outstanding community charge from a deceased's estate; and what guidance is issued with regard to the rating of a property rendered empty by the death of the occupier or owner.

Mr. Portillo: Guidance on the collection of outstanding community charge where the person who was subject to the charge has died is contained in community charge practice note No. 24.

A standard community charge may arise in respect of a property which was the sole or main residence of the owner and which becomes vacant on his or her death. The Government have provided that no charge is payable until three months after the grant of probate or letters of administration are made. Charging authorities have discretion to extend this period and to set a standard charge which is less than the maximum if they wish. Guidance on this is contained in practice note No. 13 and practice note No. 24. Copies have already been placed in the Library of the House.

We propose for next year an extension to six months after the grant of probate, or letters of administration are made, of the period before an unoccupied property can be charged at a multiplier of more than 0 on the death of the occupier. Details are contained in a consultation paper, "The Standard Community Charge and other Matters", published on 19 July, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Sheltered Housing

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether residents of Anchor housing and other sheltered housing schemes will be eligible for the further transitional relief under the provisions announced last week; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: We estimate that more than 4 million additional people will receive transitional relief next year as a result of our proposals. Whether an individual qualifies and by how much will depend on the assumed rates bill, the assumed for actual community charges and the number of chargepayers who were resident in the property on 31 March 1990. Those relatively few people in sheltered housing schemes who do not qualify for transitional relief may of course be entitled to community charge benefit.

TRANSPORT

Veteran Aircraft

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the flying accidents involving veteran service aircraft in private ownership which have occurred during the past 15 years.

Mr. McLoughlin: The following information is for the period 1 January 1976 to date and refers to notifiable accidents to United Kingdom-registered aircraft worldwide and foreign-registered aircraft in the United Kingdom. Types such as the Auster, Chipmunk, and Argosy, which have both civil and military certification, have been excluded.

Empty Properties

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the percentage of properties suitable for residential use and owned or administered by his Department (i) empty for more than six months, (ii) empty for more than one year (iii) the regional distribution of these properties, (iv) the number of these properties located in inner London boroughs and (v) the number of these properties located in outer London boroughs.

Mr. Freeman: The information is not available in the form requested. At 31 March 1990 the Department owned 2,241 residential properties acquired in advance of requirements for the trunk road programme. The Department's policy is not to leave properties empty if they are to be retained for six months or more and a tenant can be found. The table sets out the information that is available.

M3

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what date the report from Mott Macdonald and Kelsey Associates into the widening of the M3 between Bar End and Bassett was commissioned.

Mr. Chope: On 13 June and 27 June 1989 respectively.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the alternative tunnel schemes for the proposed route of the M3 around Winchester which he has at any time considered.

Mr. Chope: Since the announcement in September 1981 of the fresh study into the Bar End to Compton section of the proposed M3, the following alternative tunnel schemes have been considered. References in brackets identify options discussed at inquiries.

1982 Consultation
Various tunnel options under St. Catherine's Hill.

1985 Inquiry
Tunnel under Compton between Poles Lane and Place Lane (C1).
Five tunnel alternatives under Twyford Down (L1, L2, J3, K3 and INVPS).
One tunnel option under Plague Pits Valley (K2).

1987-88 Inquiry
Eleven tunnel or part tunnel options under Twyford Downs (JAG 2, 3 and 3A, TPC1, AL1 and 2, JK1, CC2, EJV1, a land bridge and Base Case option).
Two tunnels at Compton (AEB1 and 2).

Post 1987 Inquiry
Dual four lane tunnel under Twyford Down.

Egremont Bypass

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest estimate of the start date of the Egremont bypass; what slippage has occurred in the commencement of the work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Work is expected to start in the spring next year. We have had to postpone the planned start to prepare a compulsory purchase order on a factory which has been built recently, without planning permission, on the line of the road.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what errors have occurred concerning compulsory purchase orders issued in connection with the Egremont bypass; and what delays have resulted.

Mr. Chope: No delays have resulted from errors in the compulsory purchase orders.

Greater Manchester Relief Road

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) with which organisations his Department has had consultations regarding the Greater Manchester western and northern relief road sections M56 to M62 and M62 to M66;

(2) when the consultant's report on the Greater Manchester western and northern relief road between (a) the M56 and the M62 and (b) the M62 and the M66 will be published;

(3) when he will seek the views of the public on possible routes for the Greater Manchester western and northern relief road between (a) the M56 and the M62 and (b) the M62 and M66;

(4) if he will arrange for the hon. Member for Worsley to be given copies of the consultant's reports on the Greater Manchester western and northern relief road which are currently being considered by interested local authorities and others.

Mr. Chope: The Department has consulted 33 organisations on an informal and in confidence basis. I am sending a list to the hon. Member. This consultation is part of the fact-finding process leading to the preparation of a technical appraisal report by our consultants. The consultants' report will not be released to those organisations and it is not our policy to publish such reports. Publication could lead to widespread and unnecessary blight on routes which, after consideration of the report, the Department decides are not viable. We shall, however, after consideration of the consultants' report publish our conclusions in the form of a document for public consultation. This will present information and seek comments on routes which we believe are viable and explain why we have rejected other options. Our current programme envisages a public consultation early next year. I shall ensure that the hon. Member receives the public consultation documents.

Road System Management

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report the new units, regional offices and divisions created for the management of the road system; and if he will list their addresses, telephone numbers, directors, and deputy directors where appointed, and the last prior professional appointments of those directors.

Mr. Chope: Management of the national road system of motorways and trunk roads in England is the responsibility of the Department of Transport. I have today written to the hon. Member with the information he has requested.

Airports (Review)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out the procedure for the Monopolies and Mergers Commission quinquennial reviews of airports in Britain; which airport companies are to be reviewed; what is the time scale for the review; and if he will make a statement on competition in airport services.

Mr. McLoughlin: Airports designated under section 40 of the Airports Act 1986 have imposed on their permissions to levy airport charges conditions regulating the maximum amounts which may be levied during a five-year period. At the end of that period the Civil Aviation Authority may modify those conditions, having first made a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The Airports Act lays down that provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973 and Competition Act 1980 shall apply in relation to such references. The commission's report on the reference must be completed within six months of the reference being made.

Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports have been designated under section 40, as has Manchester airport. The conditions imposed in respect of the BAA plc airports expire at the end of March 1992, and the CAA proposes to make a reference to the MMC towards the end of this year. The conditions imposed in respect of Manchester airport expire at the end of March 1993.

Designation under section 40 is only one element of the machinery for the economic regulation of airports established under the 1986 Act, which elsewhere empowers the CAA to act against exploitative, discriminatory or predatory pricing by any sizeable airport, including the four owned by BAA in Scotland. I am satisfied that the Act provides a properly rigorous regulatory regime.

Road Schemes (Reports)

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport at what stage inspectors' reports on road schemes promoted by his Department are seen by the road programme management division or any regional office responsible to it.

Mr. Chope: Inspectors' reports are first sent to the planning inspectorate, which passes on the report to the regional office and the headquarter organisation of the road programme directorate.

Bus Companies

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the early privatisation of Merseybus and GM Buses together with the current financial support provided to these organisations by the passenger transport authorities.

Mr. Freeman: We support the early privatisation of all local authority bus companies. I therefore welcome the progress made towards a sale of Merseyside Transport Ltd. to its employees, and have made it clear to the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority that we would also consider sympathetically a sale of Greater Manchester Buses Ltd. Passenger transport authorities have no powers to provide financial assistance to their bus companies, except in exceptional cicumstances and with the Secretary of State's consent. No applications for such consent have been received in respect of these companies.

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has yet decided whether to use his powers under section 61 of the Transport Act 1985 to require the division of Greater Manchester Buses into smaller units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I am asking independent consultants to advise on the implications which different forms of splitting would have both for the financial position of the company and for competition in the area. I shall take a further decision in the light of their report.

Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make available the prices paid for individual subsidiaries of the National Bus Company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Individual sale prices will be published in the forthcoming report by the Comptroller and Auditor General to the Public Accounts Committee.

Driving Tests

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the minimum period required to elapse between successive driving examinations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: For the "L" test the minimum period prescribed in regulations is one month. There is no corresponding minimum period for HGV or PSV tests.

M40

Mr. Andrew Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department had given approval for the northbound carriageway of the M40 motorway, south of junction 5, to be reduced to one lane on 20 July, without prior publicity or warning being given to traffic before entering sliproads to join the motorway; and whether his Department will publish details of any future roadworks on the M40 over the holiday period.
